Not a crime, but you'd probably get charged for nuisance (15% of weekly salary) if you mention about your own existensial crisis on the public too much.

Intentionally spilling gasoline on the street.

Not a crime as we consider all property to be theft. If anything your workplace would probably need to be sent to a "Kindness Adjustment Centre" for claiming to own something that can be stolen.

We don't have squirrels in our part of the world so it's technically not a crime. You might have to sit in the time out chair for the apple cider thing - while we appreciate that you need to express yourself, it's unkind to do things like that to others.
