Their nation is, essentially, a subversion on the typical notions of what "FT" is... which practically makes them FanT with some inserted technical explanations, I assume? Can't tell from how novel it is. ??

They are essentially an alternate history where Israel is never founded, and a Jewish homeland is instead established in central Europe. I really find this to be one of the more fascinating nations purely because this was an actual possibility.

The Frent Popular is an anti-immigrant nationalist party formed in 2015 in response to a mass influx of Syrian refugees into Cantelo. While it officially denies being a racist or violent party, it has trouble escaping such allegations, as it tends to attract the support of white supremacists, employs fascistic imagery involving traditional Cantelese symbols, and often makes use of militant rhetoric, with one particular ad for the party they put up in 2017 having been recently taken down due to its apparent advocacy of race war.

Around 15% of the population are descendants of 16th-century refugees escaping persecution during the Protestant Reformation in the UK. The refugees have had a great effect on Cantelo, with the national language of Canteles being a combination of Middle English and Catalan.

Mkay tell me again why there are so many germans?
16% is a lot in any country think about it if you had 100 people youd have 16 but if you had 100,000 you get 16,000 that is a huge problem considering the strained relationship. The white population in our country is probably (not counting those born here) 2million ish? Still a crap ton but its not 16%

The original leader and founder of the pan-African revolutionary movement that would go on to create the UCA was Biya Mugabe, who is argued by some to be the nation's rightful ruler as opposed to King Emilio, who started out as his right-hand man. Emilio had a large supporter base within the movement due to his ties to the USSR and his inclination towards strong leadership, while Mugabe appeared to be weaker. He eventually abdicated and gave his position to Emilio, believing him to be more competent.

Empyrius has its origins within a much larger, influential polity that has fallen in the annals of history - it, thus, carries over much of its progenitor people and sociopolitical outlooks in addition to some of its technologies. This modern polity utilizes such power and knowledge in its own unique way thanks to the interesting dynamic of it... floating.

Space debris from the Second Battle of Vera irradiated much of the planet and ignited planetary wildfires that decimated the food supply, causing widespread unrest and the beginnings of a political shift against the established government.

...honestly, yeah, this is how you write technology and politics influencing one another. I'm reminded of Nick Bostrom's "black balls", technologies that have the risk of causing civilizational catastrophe merely by existing. Nuclear-powered orbital spaceflight? That'll do the trick.

They exist as simulated minds in a collective consciousness, within a Matrioshka brain composed of many solar sail-supported satellites surrounding the parent star. It is led by an artificial superintelligence named Holder of Dreams. Entire universes can be simulated with billions of years of subjective time (while a much shorter period of time has passed in the "real" world), and inhabitants can basically play the ultimate games with all this time and scope.

I love stuff like this.

They're currently involved in a third world war, which began very shortly after the second in 1949 as a German-led anti-Soviet offensive to expand further into the East. Germany already holds much of Northern France and Eastern Europe, with client states in Norway, Denmark, and Great Britain.
