It depends on who you're doing it against, why, and how the executor of the will feels about it. If you're doing it in a drunken manner, that's likely vandalism and public disturbance while under influence, which is 1 month in prison and up to a $5,000 fine. If you're doing it to protest them, it will be vandalism and perhaps slander depending on why you're doing that. If it is a public figure, it can be labeled as an unregistered protest, vandalism, and trespassing. All charges vanish if you are the executor of the will or have permission from the executor of the will.

6 months detention without parole.

If the person dies because of this, the penalty increases to 7 years without parole, and may be sentenced to death depending on other factors.

Disrespecting a religious ceremony during its period of execution. For example: Invading a church during a Christmas mass and disrespecting the priest or Christ himself.

The criminal is judged based on the merit and nature of the interruption.

Second worst case scenario:

Your interruption is deemed a hate crime against the religion, your mental state is put under intense scrutiny, and you are required to attend diversity training and extremism deprogramming. Once you are no longer a danger to the community, you are required to serve a 1-2 years of community service under the auspices of the religious community whose service you interrupted.

Worst case scenario:

Your criticisms are found to have merit, and a new branch of the government is formed to regulate that specific religion. You are placed in charge of the department. It is a lifetime appointment, and you cannot step down.

This sort of ingenuity is encouraged among The Nomadic Peoples of The Forked Tribes. Instead of punishment, you receive a government grant to fund further research into this groundbreaking culinary technique.

Crime:

You covertly train the animals of a local petting zoo to frequently escape, break into the nearest government building, make a mess of the place, then return to the petting zoo before the start of the business day. Whenever the upgrade the security of the petting zoo or the local government building, you once again teach the animals how to bypass it.

First, the Grand Council of Portzania would have a nice laugh, then the person in question would receive a large fine.

Usually, a crime of this degree would be execution, but it's too funny.

I mean that would probably warrant a Royal Safety Comission visiting the skyscraper to figure out how and why did a person get to a place this dangerous, and a mild fine for the person responsible for the crime.
