I would argue that bad writing is better because at least you tried.

The best bad guys are not the ones who commit genocide, they're the ones who perpetuate horrible systems with no sign of dying in sight, for atleast death is freedom from a pragmatic, self-perpetuating fascist regime that treats everyone as nothing more than Human assets. Also yeah, having your leader start off normal but become evil because of years of indoctrination to the nation's 'enlightened' ideology of idealist hope for the reclamation of that which was lost is much better than having your leader be a comically evil lunatic. All leaders, whether good or bad, should believe that what they are doing is for the best of the nation and for the people living in that nation, with even better leaders perhaps having doubts as to their methods but ultimately continued loyalty to their beliefs unless something major happens that turns them away from those beliefs (and consequently leads to a conflict of beliefs inside their head).

There may be some wish fulfillment, but it's not exclusively about sexuality. Middle-aged men in power might be the norm for our world, but why not imagine a more egalitarian world for our nations, one in which political offices are also filled by women and by younger generations as well? At least, that's where I'm coming from with Baizou's leadership. Middle-aged men might be typical for most traditional-postwar-nation-states, but I'm not too keen on roleplaying six old dudes. ^^;

You get that via sortition not representative voting or arbitrary restrictions and affirmative action. That I know for certain. Unless your goal is to set quotes just for the sake of putting women and young into political office but that's hardly egalitarian.

Apart from that the idea of egalitarianism necessarily results in a rule via majority if a majority is of one demographic identity, ideas, etc. It has its own benefits and negatives.

I haven't read your factbooks to know how selection of political office goes.

i too strive for diversity in my cast

i must prove that women are just as good at leading brutally repressive regimes and organising mercenary corps to invade and overthrow the governments of third-world spacefaring nations as men

it's 2995, long past since when we should've begun working to close the wage gap. and by wages, i mean bullets dispensed into the heads of dissidents and enemies of the state aight, but seriously i definitely understand this, i don't really feel like anyone wants to write "generic old wasp politician in liberal democracy #53142" if they don't absolutely have to, so you can be excused in diversifying your characters in that way.

I agree with Baizou here, though my reasons are not only regarding diversity and representativeness. Most of my nations tend to be headed by childish, and relatively young leaders (or at least people acting like they're relatively young) not only because gerontocracy is boring (if I wanted to see old people who should be getting Pfizer vaccines and not in political power, I'd read NY Times) but also because I dislike the strict zero-sum and competitive arena of politics, as well as the lack of idealism many politicians tend to have. I know my cast of characters is guilty of wish fulfillment in that regard, but honestly I don't care. I just want to create a world where politicians don't look dead or are all corrupt or want to kill their rivals like in our real life.

I can't link my sources to you right now, but I believe studies in general suggest increased political activism and turnout combined with PR systems and abolishing FPTP helps a lot with increasing diversity of lawmakers to become more representative of a nation's population.

i personally enjoy writing. i don't make long factbooks to flex on other people, i make long factbooks because i derive satisfaction from writing factbooks, and find it fun to push myself to see what i can create. if people don't bother to read that, well... i don't care. i'm not making my stuff for everyone. i'm making it for myself and the few people who happen to enjoy it, most of whom are already friends of mine here.

if someone doesn't want to read it? fine, no one's making them at the end of the day, this is a hobby- for all of us.

Now I feel bad for wanting to write long ass factbooks.
