For murder of one person, you'll get a life at prison at the worst.
More people killed, the more likely you'll get the death sentence

Fabricating a false alibi to get away with murder?

Depending on how serious the murder was between life in prison or the death penalty.
Additional every person found to aid in the fabrication will get up to 20 years in prison.

Depends. If it's good, then life in prison. If it's ABSOLUTE TRASH, then 2 years in prison.

As much as some would like such people to be criminalised, it is in fact not a criminal offence, and therefore has no prescribed penalty.

Not a federal crime, as cheating on tests is something handled by the school administration, not the government. Punishments handed down by the school administrators can vary depending on the severity of the cheating and the importance of the test, but the cheater can expect at least a zero on that test grade alongside detention, exclusion from extracurriculars, and flogging from the teacher.

As long as they don't do anything bigger or disturb other people while doing it, none. It isn't enough to be a crime according to us, it's a right of speech even if wrong. And if it's clearly wrong anyway, people would ignore them.

You'll spend your life under surveillance, watched 24/7. The first hint of a violent action and it's straight to jail - although in extremely rare cases you could be killed on the spot by law enforcement if there isn't enough time to intervene. You also could possibly face a charge of treason which is the only crime in Tangatarehua that still (theoretically) carries the death penalty.

For the most part we don't really punish people for deserting the battlefield. It's their call if they wanna live or die, but if Laura catches them, she'll probably break a few bones. That's hardly an official punishment, though.
