If you're a student or a staff member, it's not illegal, but your school may still carry out disciplinary action against you. If you're a parent, you might be escorted off the premises, but you probably won't even get sued unless it's a consistent issue. If you fall under none of the above categories, you're going to get arrested for a very, very different reason...

If it was done not because of food poisoning or disease, but deliberately, a fine for the first offence, a short jail term if it happens twice, and the third time the person is charged as a peadophile, which can get anything from several years in prison all the way to the death penalty.

Spreading coronavirus deliberately?

I mean if you poop in public that's gonna be a crime no matter what, and the punishment is a maximum penalty of 6 months in a penitentiary and/or $660 in fines.

Burning a book in public. It doesn't have to be a holy book or a popular book or I don't know the constitution, it's just a book and someone burned it in public.

Probably a visit by the local Miliz unit who will kindly submit a fine respective to a percentage of resources they've stolen, alongside locals who would probably be extremely angry about someone stealing their wealth. Local Lord-Lieutenant might even raise a militia to deal with this problem..

A company purposely not employing locals?

Depends on how you define "locals", but employment discrimination based on species (with exceptions to jobs that their race is biologically unable to do), race, ethnicity, nationality, or tribal affiliation is against federal law (which was made due to an incident similar to this where certain businesses would refuse to hire Karkpopians under the idea that they were "too tribal"). So, not hiring a local on the basis of not being a foreigner (or vice versa) is a lawsuit in minor cases and - if this persists - other legal action up-to-and-including jail time (5 years maximum).

Civil Rights Lovefest

tl;dr: First Lawsuits, continuation leads to jailtime.

Burning a religious center (church, mosque, etc) of a minority religion (less than 10%)?
