Antimatter superweapons were invented just recently and many nations (considering nuclear war happens between warring space empires on a daily basis) are disarmed with antimatter superweapons since antimatter is harder to obtain than uranium (or atleast in my canon)

You do realize this is an OOC thread, right?

The Black Remnant wrote:

The fun part is, you're forgetting the risk of MAD, and even the costs of such nuke mines in the first place (although I will note, considering the application and size, they are likely far below 300 kilotons. At the same time, though, they're so small that practically conventional explosives would be better in that case lmao)

The first and second part is true.

The third part... eh, that's exactly the issue. Why use nukes when conventional bombs are both cheaper and less destructive short-term and long-term. I'd see the usage of nukes as a last-resort thing against a much larger/more powerful invading force. But mines imply very liberal usage and distribution.

that's also not true. you'll most likely end up with a fizzle, essentially having the nuclear material predetonate itself apart, at least in gun-type systems. i'm not sure about the more modern two stage thermonuclear models, but generally speaking they have an explosive jacket, which, if it ignites, will still probably make the weapon do some sort of boom even if the weapon mostly fizzes. fizzes still spread radiation and fallout, and they do still explode, but at a greatly reduced range and power. castle koon, a us test of a 1 mt weapon, fizzled, and it still produced a 110 kt blast. needless to say, detonating any sort of mine-clearing explosive, be that of a line charge or an aerial weapon, anywhere near a nuclear mine-type weapon with a yield in the hundreds of megatons is probably not a good idea regardless of the safety features present on the device in question. dumping one out of a truck is one thing, detonating high explosives directly next to it is another.

There are some solid themes going on behind Call of Duty's stories and stuff.

They just fail to present those themes and shit. Horribly.

"Rumors of CFC affiliates building superweapons in orbit over Earth is fake news. Watch groups have corroborated this even though it would be to quote the BoD "totally rad."

Man, if y'all wanna have a good chuckle, look up the nation Keshiland/Republic of Keshiland's old WA proposals from a few years back and just read some of his threads. Dude was such an immature jackass who had no idea how anything even worked, just went on and on about how his proposals were totally 100% legal and great and will totally pass with flying colors and would 'threaten' (read: immaturity RP) anyone who criticized him.

Just uh just don't read his non-WA posts, especially his NSG ones cuz dude was legit a bit off his rocker.

I may have read most of his old WA threads today because I finally remembered that he was the other crazy WA guy that wasn't Bitely. (I mean at least Bitely didn't end up DEAT'd/likely DOS)
