On a serious note though, I may be taking the American Jingoism a bit too far, but hey, I'm equally distributing the jingoism around. Though somehow Russia's the state who uses it level-headedly and not blindly.

Is it me or do the personalities of everybody's characters feel like they're a reflection of the user's personality? e.g. when one of the user's character(s) see a character they hate, they just make snarky, silver-tongued remarks like those popular high school girls in those cheesy teen movies you see on the Disney channel in the 2000s.

Am I overthinking this? Probably.

The Messianic Kingdom exists after Armageddon, where God installs Jesus as King over Earth in paradisaal conditions and people who are genuine worshippers are perfectly healthy and in their youth forever. No division, no politics, everyone is happy and vibing finally.

This is proof that people can powerwank without the use of future tech armies.

And like I mentioned before, the characters just seem to solve just about every single problem that is plaguing our world IRL. Firstly, apologies to everybody else here that I might offend, but solving the myriads upon myriads of extremely serious problems we're all facing IRL ain't gonna 'Adios' straight away with your own ideologies and the plans suggested by your fictional characters.

That's what I try my best to avoid, to be honest...

I have this philosophy that, if I am doing roleplay (Which F7 kinda is, and character creation is a distinct part of the process), I should try and distance myself IRL, and my characters as much as possible. There may always be elements that roleplay character and myself IRL may share, but usually they are different from myself. Because if I wanted to self-insert and hide it behind a character, I don't really consider that roleplaying, moreso 'faux' RP, because realistically... I'm just playing as myself, no?

That's why more often than not, I prefer making Female characters to RP as... It's the opposite of my gender, and thus I can more easily distance myself from IRL, and RP as a specific character because of that. The more I can pretend I am a fictional character in RP, the more interesting and less self-insert(ey) they are.

(Though recently, I have been having less trouble with character RPing as males, though some of my absolute favorites from the times I've RP'd are female)

I mean, if you want to have a leader portrait, especially when it's an original character. then your choices are either:

- Take a picture of a real life person and say that it's your fictional leader character
- Take a picture from anime/cartoons/etc and hope that's obscure enough for people to not immediately notice it.
- Use thispersondoesnotexist.com
- Use a character creator from a video-game
- Draw it yourself, which depending on how good you are can either end up good or bad.

Probably mentioned before, and certainly can be considered part of what TMK said but uh, NSes where the COVID-19 crisis happens but somehow it's not really even remotely close to the pandemic it turned out to be in real life. I can understand the pandemic not happening at all - I do worldbuilding to work on semi-realistic fantasy, don't need to bring in real life problems into it - but still.

Tbh, I can relate to this one, since for my own roster of characters (monarchs), I kinda made them all distinctive in their own way themselves, with the earliest one, William V the militarist guy, to George V the pro-Canadian guy, Edward VII the pro-German guy, and so on..

Paragraphs of text on a [background=black] that don't show up properly on dark mode because they didn't put [color=white] and now you have to highlight the text to read it. (this post is a recreation of that)

Another cliché is me taking time to realize a massive mistake then editing the post a billion times.
