Most districts decide their own punishment, but if you're summoned by a federal court, fines can be heavy, specifically because it's mostly quite important cases that end up in the federal courts.

Only the government has the power to "ban" things, so I don't know how exactly a private citizen could "attempt to ban" something for other citizens. Even if aforesaid citizen forbids another from these sorts of relationships, this deed in and of itself is not actionable by law, though at the same time, only that citizen could enforce this through his own means—however if those means amount to unlawful acts (eg violence), then and only then it could be punishable. If a private citizen attempts to convince the government through lobbying or public demonstration, this is not punishable given everything is done through proper channels and with all necessary paperwork. If a lawmaker attempts to ban these relationships through legislation, it also is not punishable, regardless of whether or not the relevant piece of legislation is passed by parliament.

As a foreign citizen in YN, premeditated murder.
