"Let's see... blue SKIN, NON-glowy hair, not the size of the statue of liberty, but not far off... ye gods there are just so MANY of them! Oh. Ahem. Hello! Pardon, I was brushing up. I must say, you and the other higher-ups have a lot of extremely odd circumstances floating about your respective histories. What a way to meet your future husband! Like a firecracker going off, I daresay. So hey I wanted to bring something up: we're pretty good with robotics... we can make you a body if you want. They're fully functional, in every sense of the word, and we've been doing it at that level for so long we don't even consider the information proprietary anymore. Just in case you were considering taking your relationship in that direction. Thought I'd make the offer. Fair warning though: it's a service." -KazRamael

What would you have left to stand on? Look, credit where credit is due. If nothing else you aren't an idiot... Quite the opposite if I'm telling the truth. But the fact of the matter is, you are little more than a fresh new face for the old guard - an elite club of right-wing imperialists, certainly entrenched deep enough to withstand the ruthless barrage of young men with the same fundamental beliefs as them. You're not an outsider anymore, you're a fucking aristocrat."

"No, the fact of the matter is that I am a politician, and you are a revolutionary. I came to politics to promote my democratic and policymaking vision and to root out corruption, and you 'came' to politics on horseback to overthrow a literal tyrant. We don't even have those here. I didn't have to murder anybody or to uproot and outlaw whole classes, yet I have succeeded in instituting the social evolution that I had envisioned. Aristocrat or not, I gave my country direct democracy, I don't see one where you are."

Speaking as a former soldier from the Imouto War, hand-to-hand combat really is a bold feat he possess, though, personally, a ranged weapon, especially one loaded with enough bullets to clear a whole line of infantry, is a preferable alternative to axes such as the ones in his possession. "Pacifism? Dross! We live in an age of conflict where man kill each other to test their ideals. You cannot be an observer to the bloodshed around you as conflict will inevitably come to your land from the inside or outside. And what even is a divine right? A mere excuse to proclaim yourself as "special" compared to the plebeians merely because you have blue blood flowing inside of you. Only in death would everybody be equal; including divinely-ordained men. I'd admire men like Napoleon who fought for his throne regardless of the nobles but since you fought against the Emperor in a duel to gain your position; you are redeemable in my eyes at least."

"Le Patron is a deeply interesting individual, presiding over a bizarre and often contradictory society, and possessing violent and chaotic tendencies. He has destroyed the culture and faiths of Patagonia's native peoples and more recent inhabitants alike, and shows no concern for the deaths his leadership has caused. The world he grew up in rejected his artistic expressions and sent him into madness, though perhaps he would have found his way there himself. As tragic of a figure as he is, I cannot begin to contemplate supporting him. He is bringing great disharmony to the world, intentionally so."

Regardless of what sort of family he was born into, any man willing to put his life on the line for his country deserves that much, at the very least. I also feel I have to acknowledge that few revolutionaries can pretend to have won as much as he has, regardless of the outcome. He might not be a socialist, but because of him his people are free from the tyranny of Kozavia. That's a great feat on its own. But something about his victory feels... Empty. I mean, fuck, say what you will about me, God knows people have, I've never forced anyone to ask state permission to have a child. Maintaining the monarchy, symbol or not, might not be quite as sadistic, but still. He's an authoritarian without an end, which is something I can't say I'm crazy about. It's something I understand, don't get me wrong... Just something I wish the man could move past, doubtful as that might be."

QUOTE

"Wiker is a man of action and responsibility. Serious, intelligent and not at all unprincipled. That being said, he has not nearly enough faith in the People, seeing as his socialist republic washes itself in the blood of perceived 'counter-revolutionaries'... Knowing his intelligence, the dilemma between his belief in socialism, which at least currently requires a heavy hand, and his progressivism, which condemns tyranny and massacre, must be keeping him up at night. A pity - I am an ex-soldier, and I sleep soundly."

-Manfred Fürst von Blume, Hochmarschall des Reiches
