If Maxy wants to sue for an obvious rip off, he has every right to.

Pay people large sums of money to go move to areas where an important election is occurring to sway the vote in the favor of your ideal candidate or whatever party paid you the most money.

This is still technically Election tampering so a couple years in Jail and community service, even if you move thousands of citizens to one area, they might just vote for who they want, you only payed them to move, not payed them to vote. (unless this is a different kind of electoral system, I'm assuming something like Britain)

In Amiyoka, all government activity is very transparent in the name of Political Freedom. If it's sent with "malicious intent", then there might be a fine, but how can that even be measured? It's just a pizza, will be a nice snack for the parliament.

Kind of an iffy situation. Airport security is taken seriously, so misconduct, despite how peaceful it may be, could land you decent charges, but if you were guaranteed a seat on a plane, the plane got overbooked, you lost the seat, and are now arguing with flight crew and representatives on the plane, as long as you follow the demands to get off the flight made by the crew (if there were such demands), you'd have the favor in a potential court case. However, if they were demanding you get off the plane several times, only for you to deny to do so, you'd likely get public misconduct charges, usually fines, but those would likely be covered by the airline if you were to push for a settlement because of the situation.

Edit: Read your question wrong. If you were to physically escort someone off a flight against their will after they presented no threat and were being complacent to demands made by flight crew, you'd potentially receive assault and public misconduct charges.

Blaring an air horn next to a speech or rally the leader is hosting in order to distract everyone.
