Get put into a simulator of burning, be flogged, boiling tar, and beheading- don't call us ISIS, the accused forced our hand.

Put someone in a boiling tar sim, no justification?

That is a civil matter, not a criminal one. The falsely accused party has the right to sue their accuser (and, according to the constitution, sue the government) for any damages associated with the false claim. However the amount of compensation or damages awarded is up to the judge and the bar for proving malicious intent is quite high.

The suspect, his family, and associates would be subject to excruciating torture and interrogation to identify how they were able to get the weapon into the country and near the royal residence without detection.

Cars don't exist for us, so let's say a horse. That is considered animal cruelty, which is forbidden. You can get anywhere from 6 months to 8 years in prison, usually with a fine. Horses are well-respected in our society.
