Depends. Technically speaking, pissing on pizza is perfectly legal, including while it is raining. However, if you were to do it in public, this would count as indecent exposure and most likely be 5 years.

Considering how well funded the tax department is in trivega, this would be hard to do, so if a crime this big was actually committed? That would probably be the type of thing to get you nationally condemned.

Prison wise, Prison until parole, though the odds of parole in this case would most likely be extremely low. In the event they did get paroled, they would be prevented from legally working in any finance related job.

A jail time is conspiracy is proven to be right. Usual punishments would vary based on a degree but it would be treated as any conspiracy to murder as our president is equal to everyone thus assassinating them would not grand any higher prison sentence then that of a normal predetermined murder. Penal code of Equai for conspiracy to commit a murder and murder starts at 15 years up to a life sentence.

Not really illegal? So long as the wool is given back to the farm from which the sheep came... Otherwise, it's considered theft in a milder degree, to which one would be forced to donate bone marrow, while also being fined 570 Donars.

Formal: defenestration is considered as an act of attempted/murder. If it was done on accident and there is evidence to back this up, the person will get a fine of 500 Rostorian dollars (1 Ros dollar = 1.25 american dollar) and community service. If it was done on purpose, it is 10 years or more jail time, whether the person survives or not.

Informal: No consequences, unless the position of authority is governmental. Only the president or a high ranking member of the parliament can kick governmental figures. In business no.

Doing whatever is needed in BN for an execution, then kidnapping the executioner's family and forcing him to execute himself instead, escaping from the country while being presumed dead, then hacking BN's internet and replacing every video with a rickroll then blowing up BN's equivalent to Area 51 (if applicable)
