Cliché I am confident has not been mentioned before: Opinion dispatches by people who want to address the evils of either the left or right. Exempli gratia: Notes on the Left by minus Ra minus (-Ra-); I've seen these dispatches, including ones that put Nazism in the same spectrum as Communism because 'National Socialism is socialism because the word 'socialism' is in it'.

Moral of the story is: just put me in the ground already.

I have my disagreements with -Ra-, but they are a true intellectual heavyweight of NSG.

And every time Nazism is put in the same limelight as socialism, a new brain cell dies immediately. Like a stillborn baby.

Thusly, these two sides form the unbreakable, conglomerate foundations NationStates is set on since and remains so to this very day.

It was the guy who got really aggressive whenever someone even mentioned socialism on F7 and would try to start long NSG-tier debates in stuff like the leader thread or even entirely non-political threads like those ones where you add or subtract a number.

That's like one of the primary rules of writing to not write these things unless important to the plot. Suspension of disbelief is used for this, as one generally assumes that the characters still do that during the small timeskips. So, unless a character is supposed to be portrayed as either gross, rude or something similar, one usually doesn't write the first two things.

And that's not just for characters in RPs. If you see most of the (decent) movies, shows, comics, etc, you will find that they don't do this often or even at all, and will let the brilliant writing / scenery / etc do the comedy.

Even freaking Captain Underpants don't really have a lot of fart and poop jokes, and instead have quite a handful of clever wordplay.

It unfortunately stemmed from the idea (and thus, a cliché) that adult movies need to be crass, lowbrow, disgusting, and everything else... Which ironically set off another observation whereby movies supposedly made for kids (or with PG-13 rating) are much more thought-provoking, AND has stuff going past the radar in a clever manner.

Adult movies? What? That sort of thing is the domain of kids' (a word I truly despise, but in its teeth-grindingly annoying corporate use and overall crassness is oddly appropriate in this context) movies.
