The timeless march of history and tradition, side by side is well respected across the Monarchy Diarcesian. From the buildings of cities, each brick a story worthy a novel itself to the worn parchment detailing events from the greatest of histories to the smallest of complaints about the quality of one's copper. Where tradition and history walk, religion follows, with the faith - or at least, the influence of the faith in the national narrative - being of particular importance.

Looks like those utopian communist societies I'm used to seeing here, emphasizing on what a society under true communism can achieve. One of those images in there reminds me of that one building the Soviets planned on building: the Palace of the Soviets.
