A 31-year strife called the Dyflin Clinch would eventually lead to a Celtish-Danelager war, Jesus Christ, and above that, the war started after the Danelaw entered the fight on the side of the DFF, eventually leading to, again, the C-D War, yiiiikes.

I have learnt that the Ghesites see clouds as a form of script, either of commands or of blessings of their goddess, mostly interpreted by a priest who's reliability and incorruptibility I can totally believe in.. I don't think the Ghesites do have a developed system of writing at this point of time, so, it's interesting to think how they interpreted these. As in, through their shapes, or speed, or something else.

Accurate.

It's a very cool concept where The US and Russia overcome their differences for the greater good of their nations. What's not to like.

Despite the fact its territorial independence came from the German Empire, rather than after the Second World War, Nordland has a sizable Polish population of 1.8 million, which is just impossible.

I learned quite a few things. For starters, the Celtish-Danelager Crig spans multiple continents and while it couldn't be considered a true world war in that sense, it is rather amazing (not in the sense that it is a good war, just in term of scale). Though, the scale of this war isn't entirely shocking given the fact it seems anyone who is more than 1/16th Celtic/Anglo was involved in this war. This war, however, did not spiral out into something much worse as is often the case in wars between European powers (Post-Yugoslav states come to mind). Of course, Ixy has yet to write anything on the World's Views, so maybe this will end up being even more of a political hotpoint. Which makes sense, because even in the OTL, the British Isles is the Balkans of Western Europe.

AN: Texas is independent, which I approve of.

The regions of the Western United States, excluding California, Cascadia, and Texas, have all united under a 'Western American Republic'. For an America that seems to divide based on culture pretty well (at least compared to many American AUs) the inclusion of this nation with includes the Libertarian Mountain folk of Montana, the Liberal Mountain Folk of Colorado, the Great Plains peoples, among others seems kinda odd to me. Not to say it's a bad thing, I find the idea of a 'western' states of America quite interesting (because I am a Yeeaboo) in all honesty.

Also, the idea of a Great Lakes Sultanate is hilarious and I love it.

So, from reading the factbook on the overview, apparently, the 'Government' is a mix of Parliament, Feudal shenanigans, and an inheritance-based monarchy, which is something I can expect from a nation near the stone ages if I can recall correctly, however there's also six tribes who have autonomous reign over their stuff, although they are limited by shenanigans such as taxes, not being able to go monkey mode on anyone else (read: declare wars), which is rather disappointing if you expected inter-tribal meme shenanigans.

Why do they have a "laser force" in their military? Their armed forces are already expensive and rare enough, shouldn't they focus on more conventional forces?

Quite the surprise but for the US, Laser Technology is only slightly more expensive than conventional weaponry, same with Cybernetics, considering that SOCOM has the Laser and Cyber Forces, the aforementioned technologies are only slightly more costly to replace.

Well, not by the standards of discount-Varg Vikernes and his half-baked race war, but still- he'd certainly get blam'd off Twitter if he went around calling people "filthy faunus brigands". They seem to be in a tricky situation as their tribal confederacy made up of nomadic clans is under threat by the surrounding Empires and other "civilized" states. The civilized states seek to expand their borders to create empires while simply the existence of a unified nomad confederation poses as a major threat to civilization.

Their military has historically used several animals to aid their displacement and also to facilitate their own actions in war as living platforms for bowmen, gunmen and later even Gatling guns; these animals varied from what is typically known as cavalry...and also camelry under their geographic circumstances...to war elephants. Also understandable given their location.

Following Spanish Colonization, Palmerans took a peerage system nearly identical to that of their "mother-country", however outside of ranks the nobility was divided into two factions, one -the Civil Nobles- was made mostly of humans (Europeans or Creoles) and supported industry for peaceful improvement (i.e. attracting investment) while the other -the Militarists- was made mostly of the native neko population who wanted to go punch someone in the face.
