My vampires have this "extrasensory empathy" that is technically a hivemind of sorts. However rather than all thoughts being united, it's more that each member of a group is far more aware of each other's emotions, wants, desires, etc based on a kind of psychic link. They're able to work together on a level of productivity that humans cannot reach due to this, but they all still have their own 'selves' so to speak.

Hides anthropology book I used to make this nation

You're mostly correct. I don't wanna sound arrogant, but people into modern Eurasian history really do play EASY MODO.

When it comes to the Central Mexico, the Mayas and the Andes, the hard truth is that primary Conquest and Post-Colonial sources are the best we've got for firsthand accounts, and then very biased and filtered Christianized native chronicles of a specific region written afterward. A deeper comprehension always involve multidisciplinary practices related to language, archaeology and cultural anthropology (sometime used to compare prehispanic societies/beliefs with ones living First Nations people actually have now.) And these are the regions where there are mountains of information and where at least some languages aren't going extinct.

When it comes to North America, I can't really say too much about how much information they have on it or how studies have been directed there, but what glimpses of it I'm familiar with do seem to imply that it's all fairly recent, historically speaking. IIRC, anthropologists didn't even conceptualize the American Southwest as a cultural zone until the 1920s, and it wasn't formalized until 1954.

And then actually trying to make a Native American-themed nation is more challenging because:

- Lel, good luck conceptualizing nation and citizenship onto pre-modern non-Western societies.
- Too many F7ers have the reading comprehension skills of goldfish: they'll read EVERYTHING at face value. As a matter of fact, a lot of people assume Tohorin is a magical fantasy setting.
- The sense of memory (sometimes oral, not written) can be "historically accurate" or "objective" from a Western POV, but it's often not infused with a sense of linear progress. In baby talk, talking about time scales and eras can be a bit wonky, especially if reality is perceived as being cyclical.
- Unfortunately, I fear that even readers who can distinguish myth from reality have a tendency to categorize events into objectively false and factual information.
- Why is this important? Too many readers confabulate myths with fables or tales, they're NOT. Myths are used to explain things, they're not fanciful stories, and are every bit as valid and real as what we call history in the eyes of their creators. That's why mythical discourses are often clumped up with actual historical memory.
- The above has very serious repercussions IRL, and it's often why some First Nations groups and Aboriginal communities tend to have complications over land usage and property rights when bringing up evidences and disputes at courts.

Sorry for my rant Val, I hope I didn't confuse you.
