And so I finally ask myself the following:

What have I done? Was asking that question truly worth it when it caused the entire thread to descend into an anime fueled madness?

Assuming a cliché is just a repeated trend etc, then a very common cliché in F7 at least is the very concept of leader response threads! As in, threads that pose a particular scenario involving two or more national leaders and ask for a reaction to that scenario, ranging from asking for a date to committing murder. I can see why they're popular!

Oh, another cliché- nations that aren't actually nations! There's actually a pretty large number of them, myself included, kind of probably maybe yes certainly I don't know yes I do. There's a lot fun concepts you can try in an environment like this, so any nation can really just be setting, or sometimes even just a character maybe.

A small cluster of space separated from the rest of reality. Features totally-not-magic and the lunatic ravings of my sleep-starved brain.

When you have nations that are alternate histories of irl nations and then they RP together after having separate worldbuilding there will always be some sort of argument over who's more "realistic" or who owns a certain piece of land.

Honestly though if you're doing an alternate history nation you're bound to step on someone's toes at some point. If you're going to do alternate history outside of a closed group you should be willing to make compromises with other RP partners. Or do alternate history in a part of the world where there's less opportunity to step on someone else's toes. Although I'm sure my alternate history Afghanistan steps on a load of toes because the American invasion of Afghanistan just straight up never happens in my canon, while the rest of the war on terror does.

I HAVE BEEN SUMMONED

Ackchyally...I unironically think the Entente had the manpower and resources to make Nazi Germany's house of cards fall far earlier than it did OTL. It's just kind of tedious to talk about how Nazi oil production, copper band and ammo deficiencies, and 75% less slave labor mean that the German war machine was nerfed bad. I don't regret pointing out that the Poles weren't pushovers IRL and that things could've gotten bloodier for the Nazis if they acted alone. I'd also contend that for all their bumbling, the Italians and their Regia Marina prolonged the war for a year or two because they diverted Royal Navy assets away from the Atlantic. Another big detail not happening in my canon.

IMO, the biggest artistic liberty is political and not logistical as it involves the French SocDems and their PM trying to make up for past failures in Czechoslovakia or the Nordic Countries (IIRC) and sticking up to the Conservatives. Even the plot device about the Soviets and the Japanese Kwantung Army going into a hot war before is more believable than that. The issue over GB grating India independence so they could "volunteer" +2.5 to 3 million more men is also contestable. But hey, there's also a flying saucer and cat-people so...eh...there are some brakes from realism.

TL;DR: Political willpower and capital is important.

I don't know, I guess it was a power keg like with any fandom they tend to come barging in if you even imply the thing\interest.
In regards to my flag, the silhouette is apart of the flag itself and is integral to it. It won't mean the same thing without it. The nation wouldn't be the nation It's meant to be without it, even if it is full of cliché. It's not a overlay. I think I'll keep the flag the way it is indefinitely.

Speaking about alternate history. Something that is a cliché, but not something that I would call a bad cliché. Nations that take place on a landmass in the middle of either the Pacific or the Atlantic, and where always there. Such a change in geography should have a pretty big effect on world history, but it doesn't. It might get colonized by a foreign power, but all of world history stays exactly the same as ours. I myself am a bit guilty on this, as in the history of my nation, Antarctica became green and a pretty large colony, but nearly everything else stayed the same.

A while back, I thought of a country that was on a huge island in the Indian Ocean, but I never made it.

I might consider it still, though.

Bruh, I destroyed Afro-Caribbean Culture and led to the early development of the sugar beet in Europe, also affecting slave-based racial demographics in Brazil. Also, the Atlantic Currents can get a bit fucky during dry seasons.

I was honestly surprised to find out that there are not a lot of happy-go-lucky cheerful nations.

No, this is not a self-praise. 😊 I actually saw a few nations (unicorns, rainbows, kittens), but they are either card farming nations, puppets that CTE'd, or a combination of many others.

Good though, I got the corner of the trope "Utopian World" for myself and there is no one else around.

That's because most of us are omniscidal loons who would be happy dropping antimatter bombs on orphanages /s

I guess that's because a lot of people see NS as a place to act out batshit, violent, and extreme ideologies even if they're more interested in less crazy things in real life (I mean the fact that Psychotic Dictators exists is probably the highest proof of that). As for others, a lot of people just like their funny realism either in political RP (even if they have FT they still try and be realistic with it) or in military RP. I'm honestly surprised that not only does your nation work, but that you managed to make it one of the poster-nations of NS when it comes to worldbuilding and forum interaction.
