Absolutely legal, considered as public protest. If you deface a statue owned by a private individual however, they can sue you. I'll put it at that.

Sneakily grading university-level students based on how much you like them, and gender.

2 years in jail + 10000U to every kid harmed. In case there's permanent injury, or death of one of the victims, the sentence would change to 15 Years in jail (Add 5 years per death, if 4 or more kids die, the sentence would become a death penalty) + 10000U to the non-permanent victims, and 80000U to the permanent victims.

Murdering animals? (Domestic ones, like cats or dogs)

The last person to be sentenced in Tangatarehua for human rights abuses ended up being executed by ritual cannibalism, but that was before the adoption of the modern constitution. These days it would be life in prison, although the death penalty is still theoretically an option if it's something widespread and extreme.

An investigation would be opened to discover the provenance of this gore material. If collected from the internet, then the crime would just be hacking private property, 5 years in prison minimum.

If the gore material was made by the hackers themselves then penalties of murder, mutilation and/or desecration would apply, up to and including the death penalty.

All money is controlled by the state, so it would be considered unauthorized interference of government facilities, which is a minimum of 40 years imprisonment/"rehabilitation", or even death in more severe instances.
