tbh, there is a fine line between "making a nation you'd like to live in" and "preaching to the masses about how great your ideology is"

I have no problem with the former. Hell, many of the nations I have made I would consider better to live in than my current position. It's just when I hear some guy make long NSG-esc rants (even if it's under the guise of IC) about how great their nation is because they follow omega-hyper-based Neoliberalism/NeoConservatism/Fascism/Communism? Yeah, that's what bugs me.

my ideology is the best because the words I type say it is, you must have a very high IQ to understand ugh

The premise of Valentine Z - aside from slight and minor retcons and reworks - have been constant since the day I found this nation. For example, slight changes in years, character appearances, etc..

Whether or not it's a good or a bad thing, it's actually up to your personal opinion! ♥️

Would also have to mention that I'm not here to fish for compliments. 😊 I'm just saying hey, I have my fair share of tropes and clichés but retconning ain't my thing.

It blew my mind when I used to encounter democratic countries with less oversight on government/military activities than the GWO despite the fact that, in the end, the Grand Commander still can wave her hand and tell potential auditors to proverbially fuck off

But that's just a rehash of the "no real opposition party" cliché

It's especially funny when said democratic nation loves to boast about how democratic and great their nation is, when their president casually creates a department that is basically the Stasi - but they attack "fascists and communists" rather than "counterrevolutionaries" or something stupid like that. Because clearly, a democratic president would be allowed to create a secret police without any oversight or even approval from congress.

I think around that time, Watchdogs had recently come out, so people were roleplaying like that was a good and realistic franchise.

It's especially annoying for me, because my degree is actually in cybersecurity, and my career both during my time in the Marines and as a PMC afterwards can be loosely described as exploiting telecommunications in a battlefield environment, so already, casual mistakes and inaccuracies seem glaring to me, and glaring problems are almost offensive.

Ah yes, hacking. I'll use my frenzied typing onto a computer with a black background with no regards to the coding language they've used, nor whatever the hell the actual language it's using as a base or... really anything else at this point. Besides, I find the idea of 'hacking' an airgapped computer to be funny as shit. Like, what are you going to do, force a WiFi connection that's been taken out from the operating system? Sir, that capability no longer exists, it won't happen unless you somehow have the entire base code of the operating system on whatever device you have brought with you... for an operating system that is already been modified to shit anyway... that you're trying to upload into an airgapped computer which by definition had no way to upload to remotely at all... and probably in the midst of a firefight too.

Movies: Two rival hackers hastily slapping their keyboards in no meaningful way in a sort of Naruto-esque keyboard jutsu ritual

Reality: "The IPS detected some sketchy packets coming from an IP tracerouted back to a server in this country we recently parked a carrier group next to and dropped the connection in a black hole. Good thing we're not total nonces."

Reality, but at an intelligence service: Nothing. Jimmy spills coffee on his shirt because he bumped his elbow, not because he got startled by a sudden string of arcane crap on his screen. There will be no intrusion unless the hacker manages to physically break into this place despite layers of physical security, including guys with guns who would take umbrage with the hacker's efforts.
