Throughout Penelopa II's reign, Occitania became the foremost thickly settled country in Europe and had extreme influence over European politics, economy, and culture. Occitan became the most-used language in diplomacy, science, literature, trade, and world affairs, and this continues even nowadays. The colonial empire of Occitania swollen to incorporate everything of the Caribbean and Central America, additionally to a major quantity of land in North and South America. Colonies in Southern Asian country were conjointly nonheritable, transferral in large amounts of wealth for Occitania and facilitating the event of world trade.

The Chancellor of North Germany is Richard Lagenmauer, a 58 year old from the Progressive-Nationalist Faction of North Germany. His rule as Chancellor has seen multiple things, such as an intervention in Russia, as a result of it invading Crimea.

The premises of the above NS is that a bunch of foster kids escaped their cruel foster parents in the chaos of a Y2K glitch and settled in a Cold War era fallout shelter. This is of course, not impossible because they're located in Florida where anything can happen - and often does.

"Y2K Kids" appears to have a groundhog day quality to it, as it is always September 10th. As such, the children hiding in the Orlando Bunker will never grow up and will permanently live in Disneyworld for what seems to be the rest of eternity.

This makes Y2K kids one of the most unintentionally horrifying nations in NS. Trapped in this eternal world, these kids will never grow up, they will never learn, explore the world, they will never die... they will be permanently trapped on September 10th, 2001 in a theme park that never changes. Imagine being trapped in an amusement park for millions of years. Millions.

To that, I hereby list Y2K Kids as a Keter-class SCP due to its anomalous time-altering properties.

AN: WW2 was actually less deadly than the first one in their timeline. This is because of a mixture of French Incompetence and Germaboo Magic. (Because the nation who was able to conquer all of Western/Central/Balkan Europe wasn't able to conquer the comparatively smaller North Germany 😞). Either way, the whole war seems pretty unpheseable and I rate this variation of WW2 a 6/10.

Other Way Around. France actually does get all the way to Memel, only to be stopped due to a three-pronged attack from the East, the Balkans (which was never stabilized between the National Militarists, Socialists, and France) and Hispaniola. For about 3-4 years, France does actually restore the Napoleonic Borders. I really don't have the energy to work on a long-ass factbook for WW2 at this point, tbh, so it'll have to remain vague until I post more stuff about it on the interesting facts thread, etc.. /skip

While the people of the Grand City of Shuraya can track their history back 15,000 years, the city itself was only founded 10,000 years ago... which is terrifying to consider, if you compare it to modern human history (Where no city has actually survived long enough to have seen prehistoric era -6,000 years ago- in form of a city. Damascus and Argos being the possible exceptions)

Historically, the Holy Roman Empire has always been a decentralised restricted elective autocracy composed of many sub-units: kingdoms, principalities, duchies, counties, prince-bishoprics, Free Imperial Cities, and different domains. The facility of the emperor was restricted, and whereas the varied princes, lords, bishops, and cities of the empire were vassals which owed the emperor their allegiance. They additionally possessed the associate extent of privileges that gave them de facto independence at intervals their territories.

Prior to the 1800s, population figures for the Holy empire were very obscure and varied wide. Fashionable Imperial figures (from the top of the Renovation) hint at the following: the biggest states (Prussia and Austria) hold nine and four million, whereas the remainder of the Empire maintains 14-15 million inhabitants.

Orientalism is described as a political ideology that bases itself on a post-war world, and mixes it with Mao Zedong (Communist dictator of China)'s thought, and as a result, forms an ideology that basically is about the peasants leading the charge towards a Communist revolution...

Membership in the Francophone Council doesn't seem to follow much logic. Some nations are (international variations of) France or other nations with a French-speaking population, while some others are only members because of a constitutionally-recognized protection of Francophones.

It's a bit meta, but the general jist is that any Francophone or culturally French nation can join, including France. Additionally, anyone can be an observer regardless of being Francophone or not.

Pornography, sex toys, hard drugs, cigarettes and alcohol are banned. The government of Gilead recognizes that there is an unofficial (and obviously illicit) black market to cater the demands of those last two items in particular.

As opposed to most other eastern/soviet/socialist bloc countries, western rock and pop and Japanese pop music are popular. The music enters the TSR through gray markets that pay taxes to the government, with most merchandise usually being VHS or cassette tapes.

While the government officially declares consumption of banned foreign goods to be an act of sabotage against the nation, they are actually more lenient, recognizing that if the people are happy, they will not complain. The military unofficially helps keep the grey market stocked, sailors bringing home foreign media, and radio transmissions are recorded and then pirated.

Their healthcare system, which they spend 10% of the national GDP on, has a mix of private and public features where the private sector needs to compete against the public minimum, ensuring that prices for services and medications are relatively low.
