Alright, your excellency then -- you're still wrong.

No need to be a sarcastic little runt about it, I'm a girl, so don't call a woman 'bro'. It's that simple..

Terribly sorry, I tend to use bro as a gender neutral term and so far you've been the only person to complain so I had no idea people would find it offensive. I'll try my best to remember this in the future and refrain from referring to you with terms you dislike. 😊

Okay but how does this justify independence, like, at all?

I'm not saying they should or shouldn't, I'd ideally love everyone to unite, but they are culturally and ethnically unique from their current nation. Why do you think Yugoslavia or India split up? Why do Kurdistan, Silesia and Brittany want independence? For exactly this reason.

They **were** culturally and ethnically unique from their current nation. Hundreds of years ago, if not thousands. I have been to Cumbria and I can safely say that they are just as English as the rest of us.

They don't want independence.

Yes, the Yugoslav groups, which have been at one another's necks for over a century are the same thing as some Silesians or Bretons wanting independence.

Lmao ok. Tell me when they start a brutal ethnic slaughter that causes the deaths of thousands of civilians.

No. The people with that heritage were killed/displaced by the Anglo-Saxons who now live there.

No because the entire "basis" for independence is the existence of an ethnic group which is long extinct at the hands of the ethnic group which now lives there lol

Strictly speaking that did not happen in real life. There was essentially little, if any, displacing done by Anglo-Saxons, it was mostly cultural assimilation. Which is, to be fair, about just as bad when you look at it the right way.

India literally split up because of funni Britain dabbing on Indian Nationalists. The way you talk about (that is to say, separation through cultural meanings) didn't happen there. And Yugoslavia broke apart because it was essentially Greater Serbia and non-Serbs didn't want to be in it from the start.

Dude, neither the Bretons nor the Silesians are much different from their French or Polish (respectively) nations.

Ethno-nationalist separatism is pure nonsense and neglects what a nation actually is. The Bosniaks, Serbs, and Croats all generally had separate nations and not just ethnicities. Bretons and Silesians are basically just French or Polish.

Bretons are Celtic. France isn't, though, you could argue it once was.

Silesia was part of Germany for a very long time; many Silesians affiliate with Germany rather than Poland.

This is a Cliché thread and this has gone well off topic. I will be ending it here.

On the contrary, making little TV tropes bulletins is very useful. A good chunk of F7 won't read "actually useful information" that isn't in the first paragraph of a dispatch.

I hate to sound so cynical about it, but when people just quote part of the introduction of an overview thrice in a row or more, I get the urge to just quit. Fortunately that hasn't happened in a while even if I've more or less stopped using LP in several Factbook threads. But lately I've been feeling very bad about LP in general because some historical PODs/Butterflies should be Mothra-sized.

I've seen other players make OOC notes and condense key facts about events and characters before a wall of text or in footnotes, and that's also useful. But one risks the danger of having readers just remembering exaggerated or singular details or character traits. It's very egregious with characters who get (speaking of TV Tropes), Flanderized by the readership for one sole defining trait. But hey, if people remember your stuff, they're reading and that can't be all bad.

Though tbh, many people are busy IRL. I know I skim through other people's factbooks when I'm writing reports on another tab, so I can't and shouldn't blame 'em. The fact that somebody else spares seconds of their time to my hobby is no small thing. Getting the same answers just feels a little vexing at times though, it makes one wonder how to emphasize other things.

It's hardly ridiculous. Northumbria generally has other concerns than devolution -- at the very least, Wales has its own language.

Cumbria has its own language and it's Celtic, so I could see Cumbria becoming somewhat like a new Cornwall in the coming decades. Cornwall and Cumbria have a more valid reason, by literally having their own separate ethnicities from England.

There is at least something of a Northumbrian identity in the North East. There is no equivalent in Cumbria, which was invented in 1974 (similarly, you do not see a 'Tyne and Wear' identity). The region is no more Celtic than Northumbria is.

Anyway 'Celtic'ness is a meme and this is why Scottish nationalists LARP as though Scotland is 'Celtic' and speaks Gaelic when lol no it isn't and it hasn't for a pretty long time. While I am always one for freeing England from the oppression of the British state "I hope the UK is no more and Cornwall is independent" come on really guys I can get online left support for Scottish independence I can even get it for Wales if you really have a gripe with Britain but Cornwall?

To stop wallowing in self-doubt and to get back to clichés, I'm gonna mention a few anti-clichés that I think have a lot of potential but aren't too common in NS.

- 1) People really under-use natural disasters. It's a golden opportunity because semi-realistic events can be meshed with real history, like the 69230 Hermes asteroid falling down in 1942; or higher volumes of volcanic ash adversely affecting European nations and the first era of colonialism during the Little Ice Age.
- 2) The Silurian Hypothesis is neat.
- 3) Similar to 2 but having ancient cultures IN SPACE meeting modern humanity. I've only seen 1 or 2 nations like that, long ago.
