It has a unitary legislature dominated by a technocratic single party that assigns positions largely based on the degree of the representative's research and scientific advancement. They'd somewhat get along with the Godulars on the scientific front.

What I found out: That due of the Executrix's (one of the Godular's main characters) view of the Godular takeover being more open minded and not clouded with rage, she isn't particularly well liked by her family or some parts of the society she came from before the Godular takeover, but she overall has managed to cut the family out of her life. (Also, I love how the user doesn't go way too deep in listing all of the ranks and military equipment in their MT military factbook, because I can relate to that sentiment in a way).

The Godulans also don't use formal military ranks anymore. They just have experts that are empowered to act at need.

Very interesting indeed!

Murder, Treason (none in 6 years), and a handful of martial offense that are still on the books (none in over 2 decades). Generally the default punishment for 1st degree murder is death, but only about 10% of murderers are executed due to loose mitigating factor statues.. That being said the use of the death penalty is growing.

Africa, by some method is more underdeveloped then in OTL, with frequent rebel raids. China mostly survived the war and quickly rebuilt becoming one of the more powerful polities. Also Siberia is it's own polity now!

That they've got a very strange, very complex system within their penal codes to determine sexual assaults. I wonder if that actually aids or diminishes police efforts.

Criminals are kicked of the edge of precipices, though we're unsure what acts can constitute criminal behavior in their society or if there are degrees of punishment for the severity of said crimes.

The local Neko Palmerans are seen as natural-born sailors which they inherited from their ancestors, the Tohorinese. They were quite the sea worshippers for their time... ~~Grab people worshippers maybe?~~ Anyway, the Palmerans are quite haughty in their attitude when it comes to the Spanish Navy. They go as far as dissing them as "inept geriatrics and that as a people they are best suited for land in this day and age"... oof.

What I found out: Their intel writers seem to love writing about the life in first person or with very few cases where they are straight to the point, as there is often a some degree of philosophical or ambiguous language used. While their interpretation of nihilism is more "grounded" than Patagonia's surrealism, they don't like "realist" art style that much, and focus on even more individualism in arts.

SC has a BLESSED HOI4 democratic path which occurs by either siding with reformists within the party or storming the palace. If the latter fails then civil war starts. It's also interesting that SC is separated through puppet states within their coalition instead of being an one big monolith.

After the UKP (United Kamilistan Party) got elected, thousands of new troops were added, and the budget cot cut by 10%, so basically they have a bunch of untrained conscripts, while their equipment ended up getting made even worse.

Oh dear! Developing a carrier cost more than developing the MAUD Committee's special bomb, though that could just be inflation. That being said, it has a limitless supply of fuel and can manipulate matter when it traverses into outer space, and its also armed to the teeth with missiles and atomic munitions...so the price-tag is likely worth it.
