I mean the Premier is typically dressed in a similar military tunic that most citizens wear, and there does exist to an extent what is often considered a state-sanctioned cult of personality, so yeah if you dressed like him most likely nothing will happen to you

What's the even supposed to mean? Legal because we have no idea what you did and we can't legislate an unknown act.

Impeding an ambulance as an oil protest, resulting in the death of the patient on the ambulance. (In ISGM, ambulances are authorized to run them over after fair warning)

Deliberately obstructing traffic is unlawful, and drivers, policemen, and the public in general all are allowed to remove hindrances from the road—they could even get away with beating them just shy of death. So, assuming that these protestors weren't arrested by the police or removed by sympathetic bystanders—or if these measures were attempted, but not enough to save the ambulance patient's life—these protestors could be charged with voluntary manslaughter, which means 10 to 20 years in prison, likely in the higher end given the circumstances. This is added on top of obstructing traffic, which is a few days to a year in prison and/or a fine.

As a bystander, beating a protestor just shy of death to remove said protestor from obstructing an ambulance bearing a patient in critical condition.

A commendation, though it's unlikely any Ionarian medical cohort would care about the average person, but if we switch up the situation just a little bit to a medical cohort transporting a wounded legionnaire, and there was a protestor blocking their way (and the cohort didn't just trample over them immediately), and then you as a bystander decide to beat the protestor up to remove them from their way.

That is considered a heroic act by the tyrannical Ionarian regime, even if the regime rarely ever commends anyone for any reason, they would likely see something like this worthy of reward and aspiration. It would further solidify the idea of patriotism that the regime wants to spread, leading to commending said bystander and condemning the protester to a death penalty.

For most of the country, torture would generally net you a sentence of a couple decades or so, although that would depend on who exactly is being tortured. A civilian without any sort of government involvement or notable achievements would put you in for around 15 years. A known celebrity, a well liked member of the community, or a police officer/politician would bump your sentence up to possibly 30 or 40 years, reflecting the bias and corruption prevalent throughout Aaaaaa's privately owned police departments. In South Aaaaaa however, the sentence would likely be a public execution via hanging.
