Another F7 cliché that I often find in F7 alt-hist anime nations: Germany (and also often Japan) becomes magical and develops Mages/Strike Witches/etc of its own, while America, England and the USSR does nothing and remains as normal boring people.

Bonus points when Germany and Japan are led by cute anime girls while America and USSR are led by boring normal men. (Bonus points when USSR is just led by literally Lenin and Stalin)

You'd think that America and the Soviet Union would be scrambling to turn their population into anime girl T-dolls and Shipgirls to fight Germany on an equal footing if it discovered magic. Or America and the USSR manages to make T-dolls, Mages and Shipgirls while Germany and Japan's magical program epicly fails (doesn't this sound familiar?).

I also find it hilarious that the Soviet Union is always depicted as anti-magic, considering that the Soviet Union seriously researched magic and sorcery IRL - CIA source

No offense, but its just a trend that I notice in a lot of nations

My main thing is that I just use the excuse that Youjo Senki does. The Soviet Union-representative nation in Youjo Senki purged mages because they were afraid of them revolting and having more power than the dude who was supposed to represent Stalin.

As for the US, well, this is based on my Flames of War stuff, so, the reason why I haven't written the US having a whole lot of magic stuff is because I've been playing Flames of War against my dad, my brother, and a bunch of other guys at the hobby store. All of which are older and have gone, quite obviously, for the more historical approach to camo and army set-ups.

Or, something I would consider even cooler, have the different nations focus on different anime technology and the technologies are seen with an ideological tint each?

For example, the Leviathan Series had the Central Powers VS Entente mirrored with Clankers (Use technological war machines) VS Darwinists (Use Bio-engineered Creatures), with neutral powers using both.

As an example for this, what would it be if the allies used shippgirls, the axis warmages or witches(japan magical girls or shrine maidens) and the communist internationale mass-produced t-dolls?

Wormfodder reminded me of Yojo Senki, where the war is fought by mages on all sides, jousting for positions among the trenches as technology struggles to keep up with the sharp and brisk pace of the war. First world war, but the lads fly over no-man's land while magically charged cannons threaten to blast anyone still left on the ground to dust.

Kieron Gillen's Uber did this quite well. Nazi Germany develops superheroes in secret based off ancient alien tech and smashes the Red Army out of Germany just as Berlin is about to fall, but can't properly extend from there because the rest of their military infrastructure and logistics are basically nonexistent. The superhero formula gets out to Britain, America and the USSR, starting a superhero arms race as all sides try to build up their forces.

In part because of the relative successes of Youjo Senki and other similar anime series, also because teutonophilia (especially the type of it that inches close to simping for Nazi Germany) and weebery seem to go hand in hand.

OMSK is far too based to replicate. Although honestly I've found it weird how no one ever tried to replicate Werbell, or ran a state off mercenaries in the first place, it sort of seems like an obvious idea when you look back at how much they were used in combat.
