Man, those times were wild... I guess I can sort of see why they didn't try to do anything too funny or outlandish with pranks/April Fools.

Imagine a prank that emptied out or hid all of your cards.

Wow. People are fucking crazy.

Rolling with ideas like these, I'm going to open a lawsuit against Max Barry and Nationstates because I wasn't proclaimed best nation in the last April Fool's prank.

Open a lawsuit because the person who did get Best Nation was a mod.

Long story short: I was declared war on by two nations. When the war had began, they had immediately began godmodding their way into winning over me. When the godmodding became so obvious it was called out even by some people who did not participate in the RP. Basically the enemy force, a standard several million men-numbered horde had landed on an extremely defended island, swarming with both regular troops who were preparing for defense in depth as well as nuclear-armed partisans and an awful lot of cannon fodder militia, without establishing neither air supremacy neither naval supremacy. You can understand how that worked out for them. Then I've asked a certain player to leave because of his awful play style and godmodding, he had rejected, the thread went to hell's and so the war was restarted, although the person who had attacked me installed new rules, restricting the usage of nuclear weapons (basically half of what I did during his invasion was nuking my territory to allow for counter attacks by the regulars). This and the support some nations voiced for me in the new thread forced him to rage quit.

South Olden wasn't godmodding, and The King Isle is very well known to be a summerposter. Literally 90% of your posts were about nukes, not just on your territory, but his too.

When he had advanced into my territory without supplies and completely ignoring the entrenched and defending-in-depth troops as well as the fact that his forces were advancing through an area with a lot of conventional and nuclear mines I think that this effectively qualifies as summer posting. Nukes were used because it would be completely logical to use them in such a situation IC. Laka is extremely outnumbered and with the populace well prepared for a counter strike, a first strike tactic seems like a good choice. I believe that this is not a thread to discuss the matter, if you want to continue talking about it let's go to TG's. If you'd like to you can post our conclusions here to prove if I was right or wrong.

Ah, yes. The infamous one lining roleplays. I get it now. Avoid them. They are just to point and just sigh heavily at. There are so many examples on this site of how to have great roleplay. It just blows my mind that so many haven't realized that very blatant fact.

Yeah. There all those problems with undetonated mines in Africa that were placed down by warlords. God help us if those mines were nuclear.

Laka is extremely serious about it's defense. Nuclear mines are basically wire-detonated (or, in case of high-yield weapons person-detonated) nuclear weapons dug into the ground. High-yields are essentially nukes with people who will activate them and blow up on them. Pretty much an ICBM without a launch system. But hey at very least if an enemy manages to get through we can keep nuking him even without actually having to worry about delivery systems! Strategic nuking your own lands, what can possibly go wrong!

ik you're being sarcastic, but I would like to point out the logistics anyways.

Provided that said said nukes are of average yield (Roughly 300 kilotons, using the Minuteman III as an example), this would be disastrous for any region even if you're trying to take out a large army. The most isolated spot in Britain (as a random example of how a European country would be affected) is the Southwest, otherwise known as Cornwall. If an army detonated a mine at Millbrook in order to "defend" the city of Plymouth, well - there wouldn't be much of a Plymouth to defend anymore. Thermal heat hot enough to cause skin and wood to catch fire would engulf most of the city, even from 6 1/2 kilometers away. Given how this is a technically ground burst, it gets worse. On a good day, Plymouth and surrounding towns like Exeter would be subject to radiation (~1,000 rads per hour) high enough to kill within hours if not minutes. On a bad day, radiation enough to kill 50% of the human population would cover the vast majority of Cornwall. This would leave roughly 600,000 people dead in a bad (but still not worse case) scenario. Aaaaand, that's in a low-density region. If a mine went off in Margate and the wind conditions went to London, it could kill 5 million - possibly more seeing how the statistics I was using came from a 2015 census. So unless your nation is as thinly-packed as Mongolia, the size of Russia, or both - it would more-or-less be suicide for the nation whilst only moderately harming the invading army. Even then, rendering a region in need of humanitarian aid and its infrastructure unusable is a very short-term solution for a long-term problem such as war.

Was this rant meaningless? Probably. But I saw a reason to nerd about why not to wank nukes in RPs and I jumped on it. /s
