In my case, it's because I genuinely wouldn't mind the POV of pilots assigned to a pressurized tin can snapping photos.

Ever since I read about the Gary Powers incident in an encyclopedia when I was a kid, I was kinda fascinated with the theme of a cat-and-mouse game upheld by average joes who doing their best at a job. The 1st Cold War has that going on with the stakes at hand, it's still the era of B-50s and RB-47s making risky flights and going up against MiGs and SAMs. A self plug, but I guess it's why I'm so enthralled with my Nova character right now. I really wish I had more expertise in describing technical processes and operations to describe their role as pilot as half-decently as I tried to write about them as a captive.

BUT from experience and commentary in F7, techno-thrillers written by worldbuilders are a hit-or-miss as readers either take them as boring inventories or those interested in military fiction get excited by the hardware. TBH, I try my best to generically describe things as "bombers" or "fighters" or "reconnaissance craft" before making specifications that might turn casual readers away.

Cliche: having an immortal leader/character and not doing anything with them.

By that, I mean simply using it as a propaganda vessel, or by having them be some pampered aristocrat. For example, let's say your character is about 400-600 years of age, and you write them as being gleeful, having not experienced any form of hardship or loss. What makes them interesting, or even relatable to the reader? Pretty much nothing.

I'm guilty of this too, and it shows in some of my writing.

Worst NSer on the site, without a doubt.

Another cliché in general.

Expecting special ops guys or more generally people deployed to warzones to not have high fatality rates and somehow are supersoldiers.

Why they are special is due to all the high risk. Things go bad and entire units kIA due to stupid stuff like helicopter crashes. People's legs getting blown off, etc.

Remember the video of the boko haram fighter dumping a mag into the sea, that stuff happens. That 2001 Seal on Kandahar is an exception to the rule and they still had to exfil because engaging people tends to lead to death. Or that bomb that took out a bunch of Wagner operatives in Syria. Being obliterated by superior forces once position is compromised is a real and present danger and that's why they are almost always supported by a large contingent of QRF and CAS. That is if you're not part of the insurgent force. In those cases think of Dvar during Operation Russelsprung, situation just as dire and requiring breaking contact from superior force and leaving with heavy losses. Not glamorous at all. Only appeal is the underdog aspect.

Gonna be honest, you can do it with good writing. Yes, even the most elite character, monarchs even can be made relatable to some extent going through emotional loss, personal hardships, etc. and there are quite a few RP writers who capture this dynamic really well imo, Cassadia is one of my favorite writers in that regard

I wonder if Valentine Z, Das Kaisertiche Vaterland (?) and I can make an "F7 Unlucky Trinity" now, tho.

I'm typing up a report about the conceptual history of the origins of the Native Americans on Word right now in another tab, I can envision the 1st Age of Colonialism coming to an end in early MT nations but what's the deal with 2nd Age imperialist powers being alive well into the 21st Century around F7?

Imperialism and market expansion entail "uplifting" the local yokels to buy more of your crap and earn more money in relatively more modern jobs, right? Even without external support, these peripheral regions are gonna find more sophisticated claws to hit back...added with the ideological support of some kind of nationalism unless you find a way to avoid nationalism's ramifications while maintaining an economic system that thrives on showing off why your culture and lifestyle is the hot stuff.

As there's often a lack of meaningful failures in punitive colonial bitch-slapping sessions, I also get the impression that the general populace of not-MT-Victorian England or France or Portugal or the German Reich or Japan (etc.) must be politically apathetic tax-payers, post-War musings about the ethics of colony or racism are historically moot or most people are monode wearing Eternal Anglo caricatures who don't mind their State taking the kid gloves off abroad in feats meant to whittle at 3rd World resistance that I can only imagine probably make Rolling Thunder or Pecking Duck look like child's play, if they don't solve things with proxy wars and are hunky-dory with body bags being shipped home every once in a while.

Ngl, I'm biased. I'd like to see their groins kicked in by a 'Nam or Afghanistan ICly every once in a while. LP will get it's butt burnt in Algerian sand for helping France, just lemme write about it, eventually.
