I admit I may have been a bit crass with somebody who keeps mentioning how they don't find black hair attractive. The theme struck a nerve within me, a petty childhood trauma over how relatives of mine kept saying that blonde people are the hot shit that made me feel inadequate in turn...ah wait...The review-bomber(s?). Not the other individual.

As it's happened to me twice or thrice specifically after going in Factbook threads, I always suspected it was one or several noobs who were being funny in their own little way.

I don't get why someone would dislike dark hair. Like...black hair is cool, dude. Hair can be noice in any shade. I personally don't get why blonde hair is the "thing"; is it because it's recessive? Because bleached hair can pass as light blonde? Something like 2% of all adults in the world are naturally blonde, so maybe it's the rarity of it--but red hair is even rarer. I'm sorry that your relatives made you feel badly about your hair.

Thanks, WF. It was a nasty childhood sting to remember, but, eh, there are far more pressing matters to feel concerned about than things we can't decide.

Anyways. To not make this a therapy thread, per se: does anybody else use wonky dreams or weird youth memories as factbook ideas?

No, but that seems like a fun idea if it can fit well into the canon.

I made some unused sketches and the description of an abduction (I may or may not use later on) from two memories I've had. One of a weird metallic sphere hovering around the treeline near a playground. And another memory of a blimp-like thing that I observed from the rear-view window of a car my Dad used to own, which I thought was following us around in a semi-rural road. Memory is as manipulable as putty and I honestly can't vouch in favor of aliens existing, but these funny little thoughts make for good inspiration.

Hey hey I found a new cliché! People writing somewhat suffering or negative characters always forget that they're writing people and essentially create a suffering-centered character, like, for example if a character is a closeted LGBTQ person he's always, ALWAYS talking about it. I'm am somewhat guilty of this myself albeit I'm trying my best not to do it again and again...

the way you worded your point made it seem to the average reader you were referring to the closeted person as always talking about it.

not to mention this is a rather silly concern in the first place, as the author has to talk about things to communicate them to the audience, and a narrative where this does not happen is nothing more than a blank page.

if you're writing a character who is struggling with their sexuality and choose to make that a focal point of your narrative, then that's up to you, but if you choose to do so then you're going to have to talk about it. otherwise you shouldn't be inserting it into the narrative. conservation of detail, after all, and inserting elements that you then do nothing with does nothing more than shoehorn and clutter your plot. of course, constantly mentioning it when it's not the focus of the narrative does the same, but to repeat, conservation of detail.

as someone who knows many closeted lgbt+ people, it's not that absurd, tbh. for a lot of people, being in the closet to many of the people around them can practically dominate all of their behavior and attitudes towards things. while it is true that a lot of ns players use singular afflictions to develop their characters, instead of using more than one problem at a time, it's not impossible or improbable to see characters with one singular large problem. there might be further problems that they have branching off from their primary one, but those are likely symptoms of the main issue at hand and not necessarily independent problems in their own light.

adding too many character flaws can be a cliché, too. especially if said character has 200,000 character flaws but still acts like a normal everyday person in rps and shows no flaws until it is demanded by the plot. this also applies to nations who are undergoing seven civil wars, are at war with every nation of the world except for south sudan, have had their entire manufacturing sector blown up by airstrikes, are the size of rhode island, and still manage to have like a million troops and stealth fighters and bootleg scp sites and ultra-special special forces (specialized in special combat with special enemies) and nuclear weapons and act like they can kill anyone but in reality shouldn't even really have a government because they're so utterly destroyed that there's nobody left to lead the nation.

Bit off topic, I kind of just wish there were more open-to-all PT RPs. I got tired of not having any RPs to do and ended up making basic Modern Hathian Prime stats just to RP. I used to do nation/war simulations on instagram and discord, and imo, the near-modern technology era(1900-1960s, roughly) was always the most fun to be in. It sucks that there aren't many PT nations, which will always be a complaint of mine.
