Well, I think enforcing the "Modicum of effort or it's /stillme" could work, but it requires someone else to actually skip the no-effortposter so the message gets across.
If another no-effortposter appears, they get their way.

Given he did just get DEAT'd again without checking on NS, I doubt he would bother with another video until next summer. Shame that he'd miss out on N-Day though.

At this point my stance has become and will remain, 'Who gives a shit?'

I'm an old-fashioned F7 poster, I've been active here for longer than some of y'all have even had accounts on this game. Quite literally no one who's active in F7 cared about 'low effort' posts until fairly recently and I genuinely wish it would die off. I'd much rather have a relaxed and goof-off forum game board where people, you know, have fun while participating in the forum games here than one where it seems like clockwork there's some annoying argument in a thread because 'YOU LOW EFFORT POST, I SKIP YOU, 'YOU CANT SKIP ME, 'PUT MORE EFFORT INTO YOUR POSTS', 'FUCK YOU I DONT HAVE TO', 'FUCK YOU BACK ILL KEEP SKIPPING YOU, 'GO FUCK YOURSELF', (mod comes in) 'You are both warned for flaming' every couple of months.

Also, from a personal POV, I am 25 years old. I have so much more important shit to care about that 'player on the forums for the government simulation game I still play after 13 years [criminy, I joined this game when I was 12] replied to my post with a single sentence' doesn't even register as something for me to care about.

tbf while i can get the point about maturity, there is a certain... well, level of pride that some people here put into their writing that they feel warrants a better response than those aforementioned one-liners. really the issue arises from the people who see "the forum for anything" and think "this is a place to goof off" and the people who see "the forum for anything" and go "this is a place for me to dump my writing that doesn't go anywhere else" dashing in their interaction, and its inevitable resolution is going to be the latter group realizing it's pointless to try to beat the forum into doing something it's not obligated to do when a far lower-effort option exists and fucking off to somewhere else where they can interact with like-minded people. like me, i spend way too much time just nerding out over writing stuff with some other posters who were once active here and got tired of immature "i nook ju!!!!!!!" being the only thing they ever fucking saw. and i used to write whole paragraphs on this forum. only thing that's changed is now i do it in a place that is actually built for that sort of thing, and not improvised to suit my needs like f7 is. still putter about in here, of course, but nowhere nearly as often as before.

F7 is fine for smol posts and RPs. Its annoying to see them in the National Roleplay section. They tend to drown out more thoughtful submissions to this site.

Regardless if they are PT, MT, PMT and FT, any navy that's got more than a hundred ships, like, they pump the numbers of ships to thousands, no, ten thousands, as if having a hundred ships is like having a small army of a hundred men.

Unless they explain why they have, and need, tens of thousands of vessels, and that they are a superstate abundant with resources needed to build said tens of thousands of ships, I just hate that kind of writing for navies.

To me personally, naval warfare seems a little more esoteric and hard to get knowledge of vs ground and aerial warfare. Especially since the last major naval engagements were nearly a hundred years ago. Lots of people don't know how to build a navy, myself included. I at least gave myself a reasonable number of ships with 26.

In Czervenika's original RP universe it was landlocked (no, it did not have a navy). Its strength was in its air force.

Huh, I would imagine Rokov's excitement would soon wane away as the stress of being a one-man navy gets to him.

Regardless, I'm curious as to how a navy truly works. Both as a way to educate myself and to flex knowledge in that area.
