That was the doing of yours truly.

I don't disagree, but also like how we socialize people literally does change the brain. Neurology often looks at behavior and its effects on the brain. Maybe it's symbiotic so to speak. Though I feel like a big enough social revolution can show up on brain scans too, because people's changed behavior will have a registered neurological effect, as the brain processes information differently than before.

Good argument, I sometimes do wonder to what extent social constructs can change the very way our brain operates.

Another funny thing Out of Context because I felt like the above quote wasn't exactly all that entertaining as it is on the same page as this reply.
