You kidding me? I'm gonna be praising them for it. That's exactly the sort of chaos Ari would be absolutely into rooting for, if her reaction to SP is any indicator.

And if not her, then Bert's definitely for it. Bert's fun like that, the loveable, drunk, murderous scamp.

Everyone has a reason to hate everyone (ICly). It's just a matter of how much they hate each other.

And yeah, it is fun. Both to watch and to write three paragraphs about why my characters don't like another character. Especially when I like that character OOCly. IDK why, but if one of my characters hates another character with a burning passion - that either means I dislike them or I really like them.

Welp, I guess I'm off to show what realistically happens when a rebellious prince gets married to a courtesan maid...and both of them have the style of a tacky pink Cadillac with leopard-print seats full Molly-added groupies instead of a Buckingham Palace carriage.

But hoo-boy, will Charles get a lot of flak by losing the crown for coochie.

Acting as if you hate a character when you like them is great fun. Sometimes, from what I've seen, people take it personally though.

I guess not-Nazi control over Continental Europe can lead to very visceral reactions and desires for IC revanchism in many, more than your characters being morally "terrible" or not.

If I do finish LP's main character's, I know I'd love playing with the idea of making characters do "good" things for selfish reasons. To try to blur what other readers could condemn or commend them for, that is.

I hate when people make their leader just a perfect person with no mental quirks or anything when in real life most politicians are very interesting mentally.

Even if you don't count his political beliefs, Gustav Holm is a paranoid wreck that has developed an almost physical tick for looking over his shoulders. He is also a ruthless Pragmatist who only publicly supports the LGBT movement because it helps him politically, while also being so ideological that combined with his paranoia makes him fear, hate, or suspect anything or anyone that is Russian.

Description: I'm an MT Sweden under a fictional far-right ideology known as Holmism.

rate of sociopathy in political fields is significantly higher than that observed in the general populace, for instance.

TBH I always suspected that Nekostan was literally the same user as that DOS user Katzenstaat from a few years ago because, I mean, what are the odds of two users who both have an obsession with having cats 'governing' instead of human?

And then it turns out they were Katzenstaat the whole time!

Edit: It's also really obvious when you realise that both nation names were the exact same meaning tbh

Hmmm, I've observed a pattern of people not liking clichés, therefor not liking cliché is a cliché. Trying to create a nation with no clichés means that you'll actually create a nation that is a giant cliché.

Have a good mix of tropes and just going nuts with being a cliché a little here and there. The idea of "cliché" is just when a trope is overused, but it's not necessarily bad when you have carved out something for yourself as a worldbuilder. ♥

Not sure if anyone has mentioned this (and I'm not going to browse through 89 pages of this thread to find out), but the trend of certain people having anime characters in front of their nation flags. I see it everywhere, it is like amogus (and I have seen amogus countries here too, looking at Surrealist Patagonia and Pan-Asiatic States in particular) but with anime girls and flags.

Since I don't particularly understand anime fans/the subculture I don't get why this is so popular, at least amogus had meme factor because Among Us is an oversaturated kids game where the youtubers that cover it are overreacting on purpose for views (which only adds to the meme as shitposters emulate and even further exaggerate the stupid behaviour as part of the joke). I don't see the same meme factor for random anime girls, but hey, maybe that's just me.
