Probably a fine and imprisonment for repeat offenders.

Offending foreign heads of state?

Not a crime, unless it disturbs the people or harms property, in which case, a small fine.

Indirect arson (lighting a bush on fire and it lighting up a house, for example)

Assuming "icky stuff" is things like playing in mud or slimy objects, it's not a crime.

Carrying a concealed weapon

Capital punishment and/or imprisonment with hard labor (if "and", imprisonment would come before capital punishment, obviously), murder and alcohol are illegal, and mixing the two together in a crime will maximize your sentence.

Nothing, as most ideologies are long dead relics of the past

Any "communist" flags would likely represent something such as anti-corporatism rather than the actual communist ideology, and public protest is sanctioned by law

The offender's plane would land at the nearest airport with security officials ordering them to deboard. If they refuse similar orders by that point, the security officials will force the offender to deboard. After that, the plane would continue the flight.

What about playing music excessively loudly at night?

Airline has option of preventing departure or forcing emergency landing. Then, security will remove the offender from the flight, and the airline may prohibit subsequent use of their services. All of this assumes that the airline cares.

In remote parts of the Federation, it's about a year's worth of probation and jail.

Intentional fearmongering against your supporters in order to lead votes away from your ballot, and casting it on the opposing candidate.
