Not a crime, unless if there is a report for public disturbance, then the perp will be then brought in for questioning, and probably community service, if he's a repeat offender, then there'll be jail time.

I think you got skipped, so I'm answering to you too.

Not a crime. The guards of Government House will most likely stop the person from delivering the food and just assume it was a misunderstanding.

“ Ardchu wrote:

Homicide in East Plate is punishable by death. Typically, executions are done by hanging on prison gallows (not in public). However, considering the heinous nature of the crime you are describing, the most likely outcome is that the culprit will get lynched by the people. The Armed Constabulary (East Plate's "police") is known to just let people administer justice by their own hand when the crimes are especially outrageous, by deliberately being inefficient. Lynchings can get particularly nasty, with the people torturing and humiliating the culprit before hanging him or her, usually in a public place for everyone to see.

Euthanasia is legal but requires the approval of a doctor and at least two weeks notice between request for euthanasia and it being administered. If the aid is given without following the guidelines, it could lead to losing one's medical license with a maximum penalty of one year in prison.

AAN:

First and foremost, Kranistan does not condone any form of life changing or in this case life ending choices without the consultation and especially not the permission of the state. This situation gets even more severe when there is another party involved that performed the non-state sanctioned euthanasia, which would follow with a swift execution of the offender.

Now the punishment for the offence can vary from either being brutally mutilated while being filmed for the next generation's education or receiving the proper fate for an individual whose existence is better spent as unconscious organ donor.

AN:

The destruction of foreign emblems and icons is encouraged, which might even garner some social credit.
