Property damage, that would initially come with a fine plus covering the costs of repairs AND prison time, but if you're mentally disabled, depending on the circumstances, you can avoid prison altogether, although the fine part to cover the costs of repairs is not going away, you'll more than likely have to pay when you're out of a mental institution.

These kind of issues are resolved within village's elders council but most probably the person will be asked to destroy by himself the building to not face societal repercussions and isolation.

Edit : Still stands, but due to the low access rate to electricity, the little practical necessity and the low purchasing power, this problem will probably never be presented to us.

we dont have protection on wild owner-less animals so it depends. if its from the wild then its legal really no one's gonna stop you other than tree-hugging hippies, if it's from someone's property and they own it it also depends if the owner condemns you; if the owner said that it's alright then nothing will happen but if the owner condemns you then its a property damage case.

Theft is covered under various ordinances with punishments ranging from 'not worth the police's attention' to a moderate fine or, in the event of an exceptionally-large amount of property, exceptionally-valuable amount of property, or both, or if in conjunction with another crime (i.e. robbery), harsher sentences including jail time as an arrestable offence. "Stealing food" is rather broad.

First of all, campaigning itself is considered somewhat of a crime and may land one a small fine and a few days at the police station. However, black campaigning qualifies for a dishonorable behavior of light threat level and may end up in up to half a year of jail without parole
