Now this is a woman I can stand behind. A like-minded person, almost. Well, almost in the regard that while we are both militarists, nationalists, and have a desire to see our enemies crumble before us, she is more direct in her word while I have my own hands tied. Regardless, she has fought her war practically to the bitter end, seeing through the near-total defeat of her enemy, yet this enemy of hers refuses to die. Perhaps in due time, she will see an end to that war, so her nation can recover and expand further, through more diplomatic means. Or she could just set her sights on other territories weakened by the war and absorb them swiftly in a sudden strike. Alas, I do wonder who stands with her, in the upper ranks. After all, no one person can rule the world, even if their world only covers several dozen grid squares on a larger map.

"What is the measure of a leader? Is it their ability to lead, to inspire? No, I refuse to adhere to these measurements. Man should have a backbone and spine to fight and die for an ideal that he thinks is right. Which is why I do not care about such things as democracy or autocracy. I scoff at the mere notion of leadership."

"However, it is in you that I have found the basest of human instincts: the fear of the other. Man will destroy anything and anybody that isn't them. Yes, it is ideal that you fearmonger and wage war against Earth's two strongest countries. When these two nations may seem content to leave yours in peace, you instead provoked them. You may do so under the name of national defense and preserving one's sovereignty but it is incompetence yet one which benefits me in my quest to attain "Perfect Death" as the world teeters on war."

"The High Priestess, and Ketarushima in general, provide an interesting anthropological case-study with regards to the economic and political development of early societies. She derives her authority from an allegedly divine source, of which I remain sceptical, and thus governs in a theocratic manner, although it should be noted that 'governs' is perhaps too strong a term given that Ketarushima seems to operate along more anarchic principles. From the perspective of historical materialism, I would place Ketarushima in an early stage of development, given the social organisation and the beginning of external economic relations. Perhaps a good comparison could be made with the Haudenosaunee in pre-Columbian North America.

Anyway, with regards to Mai Chie herslef, I am afraid that it is somewhat difficult for me to engage with her beliefs and policies on equal terms, given the vast gap in socio-historical development between our respective societies. I suppose that I would consider her to be reasonably progressive given her circumstances, and there is little I would particularly object to in her beliefs besides the focus on spiritual idealism over materialism, but again, that isn't unsurprising given the societal context within which she exists.

Now, I would warn her that increased cultural and economic contact with external actors will most likely have severe consequences for Ketarushima, drastically altering their way of life. Already we see the beginning of basic capital accumulation by private individuals, and it seems probable that the external actors they are in contact with will seek to advance their own interests over those of the Ketarushiman people. When an advanced capitalist economy comes into contact with a developing society like hers... Well, just ask the Haudenosaunee how that turned out for them."

I like you, Tolya, but you make me sad. Mostly sad, at least, with a little bit of hope.

You're a man who has, seemingly, never really had much agency in his life. Though I suppose, that comes with the nature of being a soldier. Even then, you had no genuine say in becoming one either, huh? Ordered around as a child - with parental benevolence, but still ordered around. Then ordered around by the State - a body far less benevolent than one's parents; the similarities between the two are still strikingly... funny, no? They are, to me, anyway - and not even to learn Tolstoy's teachings but to kill other men with an equal lack of agency in their lives. It's, well, depressing, and we're not even halfway through your story.

At least you made the best of it all; however much one can get out of being little more than a cog expected to be counted at the next mass funeral, at least. Well, you made friends with some great people, is what I really mean. You've also made with some... considerably less great people, but in your situation, I suppose you pick your friends based more on proximity and opportunity than the value of their character, especially when your life might otherwise end unnecessarily soon.

Still, you've emerged out of Siberia as the man you are today; One I can confidently call a good man, based on both what I know of you from your files and our shared experiences. I only hope you eventually find a place you can call home - one that isn't a makeshift army base constantly threatened by brainwashing evils, that is!

If I asked for a clown to run for office, I would have turned to the Yellow Party. Alas, San Horo can fill that void now that they've decided to leave the country. A man blinded by his faith not in god but in Mao, he does not realize how flawed the man was, the corruption of his mind due to power resulting in several tragic events that set up the beginning of the end of China. As we speak, the government itself is in freefall, but this man thinks that such a thing is impossible under his bent ideals of a socialist paradise! The nerve! At least I try to keep some aspects of democracy that worked, with mild aspects of what one could call a mixed bag of fascism and communism. Yet, I prefer to keep to the hard values of the one system I've seen work, without the horrid corruption of a greater puppet looming over the whole system! Perhaps he just needs someone to open his mind... But I can do that for him. Literally. Just blast open that dense skull of his, so I can puppet his body and offer a better mind in place of his own. Granted, he is rather comical, like the fool from that one play... The one with the king, what was it again? Ah yes, MacBeth. A shame he isn't as philosophical as him, though. He would have filled that role well if he'd shut up about "the glory of Maoist ideals" for a quick second.

"To put it simply, this Ortiz character is unfit to administer a china shop, let alone an entire country. She has been demonstrated to be unstable and prone to bouts of violence, which are not limited to the personal and extend into the realm of international relations, where she seems to take a particularly trigger-happy stance against all the major powers. The lunatic risks that these actions pose need not be elaborated, as they are surely clear to all reasonable observers. This is without getting into her alcoholism, which no doubt amplifies the mental instability resulting from unfortunate accidents in her past, and leaves her even more unfit to govern her country. Were I in her government, I would move to have her removed as soon as possible, one way or another. Indeed, I suspect that such an effort may already be in the process of being drafted, if only to prevent her manic incompetence from causing any further damage. After all, Caligula perished at the hands of his guards. If I were Ortiz, I'd be watching my back."

Statement from Nasser Al-Khelaifi:

The State of Qatar believe that communism and socialism are not good political ideologies and a country that functions best is on oil, capitalism and corruption. We are concerned if Karel Hajek is able to make his country better or plunge them into chaos like what happened with the Soviet Union and French football under us. Our ability to be confident in Hajek is not very high at the moment, nor do we expect it to improve in the future.

"While I, General Onox, have little knowledge of what this Sausalism even is, the word: "World Revolution" sounds really nice, I, General Onox, heard that in the north, they violently overthrew the government and exiled the last member of the royal family that wasn't killed to the Isla Ventai, it took years to rebuild that country and it was a long time full of chaos. If all Revolutions are this bloody, then I, General Onox, will happily admit to be a fan of revolutions!

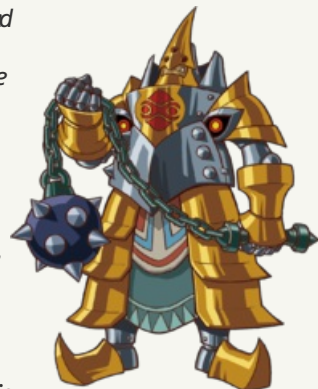

But, this is where our, General Onox's and your, similarities end, as you just love to be even worse than the old regime you replaced in suppressing the choice of the individual. Your system sounds fricking boring and should get it's own revolution, although, I, General Onox, would assume that that is where your love for these things end, you freaking hypocrite.

I, General Onox, mean seriously, you call it "For the human interest", yet all you wish to be is a tinpot dictator that suppresses the interest of any living being to do what you desire. I guess you enforcing your own world view on an entire country and forcing them to do what you wish is a certainly admirable thing, but I, General Onox, will be damned if it isn't a fricking boring vision you wretch. Now get out of my sight!"

"I, General Onox, had someone read through your article and... I, General Onox, have still little clue about who you really are, I, General Onox, would think however, that you are probably someone whose friendship would be beneficial to have, even if you aren't really a leader of a country, but a businessman and owner of some sort of athlete organisation. I, General Onox, do find the obvious beautification of your record to be charming, even if it is rather low effort in it's making, but it sadly also doesn't allow me, General Onox, to get a good picture on you. Alas, this is the only thing I, General Onox, can really say."
