OOC: Anti-Imperialist Pan-Asianism along Sukamoist lines are currently gaining traction in 1998 Dwipantara, where "Asian Tigers" should unite into a single bloc and challenge both Khilafah and western influence on the continent. Such kind of European colonial, military, and diplomatic presence will be seen as both an outdated relic from the past and an obvious "imperialist threat" to the players of the rising Asian Century. But let's be honest, I haven't really developed that idea to a solid part of the lore, so mistake's on me.

"Well, I have a hard time having an opinion of his early life, since many of the historical events mentioned have no further information on them. Hell, I can't any information on the ruling Liberal People's Party- Wait, is it the Bund der Volksliberalen?"

Well, Germany is in a better condition in their timeline, though it has little to do with Theodor. Still, his politics are something that I've never seen in my timeline, especially in European politics. He somehow combined economic liberalism with populism and a soft nationalism. Unlike Europe of the early 21st century, Germany is apparently against joining into the European Union and a stringent pro-gun movement has risen. In my timeline, it wasn't until the revolutions of the early 22nd century that gun-control laws were repealed in Europe. Most of it I actually support, though I, or the RCAS, mandates gun ownership and tends to be far more nationalist than Theodor's policies. Our federalism extends far more than that of Germany, but I guess he's working under a different framework and culture.

Oddly enough, I don't necessarily oppose his economic liberalism entirely. Some sectors of the economy are better off with a laissez-faire policy.

However, some sectors are better managed with more regulations or, in rare cases, outright nationalization. Though, I guess he wouldn't support the removal of capitalist wage labor from the economy. I also believe that he is discounting labor unions and their importance to the economy, especially in the context of job training and representing vocational interests.

Really, considering the progress Germany made through reforms, perhaps reformism does work after all. Then again, he has a smug aura to his face. Seriously, it pisses me off just looking at it."

The Statement on Council of Five

"Well, well... Just like in Karakalpak Republic, there isn't a single person leading the country, but rather a council of multiple people. How interesting it is to meet someone else who is somewhat similar. However, they obviously have a way larger scope of things to deal with, considering their history of being an universal empire, and having to fight off against genocidal beings. Time to look a bit deeper."

" "motte-and-bailey democracy", huh? It seems that most of conventional censuses like UN would classify you as somewhat like "hybrid regime", because that kind of democracy is not the bog-standard one. The flexible political system which adjusts depending on how dangerous your enemies are is a brilliant invention, along with compulsory voting, because it prevents citizens from becoming apathetic. Their strategy of lockdowns until the opponents are squashed back somewhat reminds us of what happened in Maoist China when the repression was seemingly made more "loose" in order to draw out the opposition, and then execute them. Sure, those two aren't exactly comparable, but it was the analogy we saw. However, the separation of territories they occupy in various class categories is what is more concerning for us - if you don't give in to the whims of citizens and tighten the authority just a little, you can fall down from the class level your country is in. Overall, we are neutral on them."

Whatever. The Directorate is an interesting exploration into what happens to a parliamentary democracy when one party gains excessive power. Unlike most party-dominated states, there is no leader figure to 'dilute' the party-rule instituted in Karakalpakstan. While I support collective rule and the Democratic Party played in the Revolution, I oppose the predominance of a bureaucratic party or even parliamentary parties in politics. Politics should reflect the interests of regions and vocations, not the interests of an elected elite who fail to represent the citizenry.

Still, I support their secularism and I can see them being great trading partners for the RCAS. Though honestly, they're better off under the USSR in my timeline."

"Born in a period when racial issues were at all-time high, and forced to flee after her district was firebombed? Huh, that's not the most honey backstory there. So, her family ended up in Japan? We are not surprised they didn't fare exactly perfect there either, because that country is known of being not too nice to foreigners. At least she finished the work on her thesis, and didn't just jump in politics with high-school degree, so here's that."

"Time to get to the political stuff. Well, of course you can't do much when you have been in office for only a single month, but we are sure you will rock up more accomplishments as time goes on. As we are staunchly in favor of a secular government, we don't really care about this so called "Exuism", nor the decline of Christianity's political power. Her being against trans persons definitely is like a tar in her otherwise progressive image which she has been trying to build. That said, what parts of "traditionalism" she even considers worth conserving? So far this seems like liberalism with extra steps. That said, the most boggling thing is that she supports "civic nationalism", yet she denounces it in one of her quotes. Make up your mind! Also, her support for socialism... Although we ourselves are quite left-wing economically, that thing associates with the loathed USSR for us. Overall, neutral with a negative leaning."

"Her frustration with being 5'3" is understandable, because there are persons around which would devalue your accomplishments and personality just because you aren't tall. Now, her being a bi is a thing which our older and conservative aparatchiks might not even understand."

He seems to be the "benevolent dictator" type, which can be risky, because money spent on the citizens means that it will not go for the key supporters you also need to appease, and they could be brought to their side by someone who promises them more rewards. While in this aspect he is a pretty fine leader, his program to turn cat humans into dominant species sounds eerily like assimilation. If there are minority species in his country, they would be in a deep hole. He has a military background, though - we can respect a leader who has bothered to see the ugly side of creatures."

"In low-pressure systems, of which anarchism is at the farthest end of the spectrum, Lances generally assert themselves through the establishment of religious feudalism, while at the same time engaging in marauding "vigilantism" to destroy communities that don't adhere to the Lance ideology. This was how they operated in Xious and Medieval Europe, uniting feudal lords through the Church while at the same time using lawless witch hunts to pillage and lynch "heathens" who would be incompatible with the Lance's regime. A similar tactic was used in Gotham City on Planet Crystal, where the Lances simultaneously controlled the corrupt police and criminal aristocracy while at the same time using a fascist vigilante named "Batgod" who allegedly fought said aristocrats, but in reality merely brutalized the ethnic minorities and financially impoverished whom the criminal syndicates hired. The Twilight Embassy's policy both on Xious and in Medieval Europe was to send supplies and military support to the villages, towns and communities targeted by the Lances, sabotaging communities that supported the Lance ideology, and attempting to negotiate with the rest to help us in protecting the targeted communities.

Judging by Shawn's prior career of combating North Korea of its the Lance-aligned government, we can safely conclude that Skyhooked's individualism is the result of ideological idealism (one which we may not be able to agree with, but one that we most certainly envy) and/or lack of resources (which we are more than happy to provide), rather than out of malice or negligence (as was the case in Medieval Europe and Xious). In simpler terms, Shawn is the kind of "anarchist punk" we like to negotiate with, rather than the "plucky Nazi individualist" shock jocks and doomsday-prepping "tacticoool" fascists that plague North America to this very day." ~The Council of Five

"I don't know, who the hell are Lances exactly, but from what I've heard, they are genocidal bastards, and thankfully, there are dark mages livin' in the middle of a goddamn black hole, who will fight this threat. Sounds really far fetched, but reports indicate, that they do exist. Now, regarding Council of Five, they claim to be an autocracy, but have democratic traits and lots of those. And it's all about intelligence and competence with little impact of charisma. Is this a noocracy? Because it looks to me like that. Either way, I hope they won't take us for lances. Oh, and if they need our help... There is very few regular mages in Skyhooked. Dark mages? I doubt there is one in Skyhooked. So we gonna have to use guns and machetes against Lances. But we got enough brains and cojones to fight even stronger foes.

Either way, when Twillight Embassy states it's opinion on Skyhooked, we will be able to understand them better."-Shawn Bjornson

"I don't know why these delusional Skyhookedians would believe that we would want to enslave them or do anything to them. That would be breaking the NAP and besides we have little interests in doing so. We keep Le Patron injected with money just to keep his experiment alive so eliminate us then you're going to open a Pandora Box in Patagonia."

"Now for Bjorn, he's got muchaco and cojones you know? Tough yet not bright at the same time, a very useful combination. Yeah, I like what you did to those North Koreans. Kill em and slaughter em like a Patagonian brute. We have all sorts of booze and pills you could think of in Chile so why are you pissing off a potential market? Is this the "ideal" Skyhookedian that they pass off of?"
