They encourage semi-nomadism as a means to keep a perceived chain of interdependent balance between mankind and nature, showing a disdain for urbanism but also anarcho-primitivism.

They have more droids than they have humans serving in the military, including the Eyebot model from Fallout 4 apparently. Ninja'd.

They were a nomadic people, before being forced out of that framework due to foreign interference, and after retaking their land are trying to get back to being nomads in a way that preserves the larger portion of those cultures that settled in and built up better infrastructure...

Godulans seem to be very fond of both Legos and the color purple. They also enjoy spicy food and rely on it to keep them energized, much the same way one might rely on coffee.

I did mention that the overview was obsolete & out-of-date, so... yes, but mostly no.

Their populace is not born in a usual way; instead through a combination of present genetic data & bits of another person that detach themselves.

One thing I learned is that, from approximately the 3rd to the 9th century, Neko civilization flourished on the Palmeran islands. They built circular pyramids out of rocks, and their religion was a form of nature worship that eventually evolved into an imperial cult, with the Empress considered to be a manifestation of divinity. Achievements during this time included the discovery of uses for iron, the invention of the number zero, and most impressively, the calculation of Mars's orbit. Another thing I learned is that I had forgotten just how amazing AP's drawing skills are.

Since the country is on Antarctica (and from the south pole, everything is north), there are four special cardinal directions defined as:

- west (towards the Antarctic Peninsula)
- east (towards Lake Vostok)
- weddell (towards the Maud mountains)
- ross (towards Adare and Concordia)
