Cliche: Characters in roleplays never farting or burping or going to the bathroom

That's like one of the primary rules of writing to not write these things unless important to the plot. Suspension of disbelief is used for this, as one generally assumes that the characters still do that during the small timeskips. So, unless a character is supposed to be portrayed as either gross, rude or something similar, one usually doesn't write the first two things.

So you telling me I need to cut all the bathroom scenes in my novel?

And there's the issue, given how utterly unlikely such a thing was. If a region was Romanised, the assimilation of the conquering Germanic people in question (Visigoths, Suebi, Franks in France, Lombards, Burgundians, etc.) was inevitable it seems.

I actually have seen an English Spain (specifically Catalonia and other parts of Eastern Spain), which idk if that counts, but it was a pretty interesting deviation from the whole "MT Europe Monarchy" IMO. Not necessarily for the Englishness though.

Someone should do an Islamic Spain where the Reconquista either completely fails, or Muslims are able to hold at least part of Iberia to the present. Maybe complete with Arabic speaking former colonies in the Americas too.

Because it's an interesting alternate history experiment. Certainly more than your typical European alternate history on NS.

Speaking of an Islamic Spain (an Islamic Spain during the Spanish Civil War), would Francisco Franco be a Shi'ite or a Sunni? What would the Nationalist faction look like if Catholicism is replaced with Sunni Islam or Shi'a Islam?

A cliché that I don't think people really talk about, is leaders never being influenced by outside forces, like ever. Especially in modern democracies, I don't get how there's no lobbyists/special interest groups pushing to prevent laws that could restrict oil use, strengthen labor laws or whatever they want to stop.
