I like to think that people who play real-time strategy games unironically think they're great military strategists, and one day they suddenly discover NationStates and start joining modern tech war roleplays in International Incidents, and using their experience playing mlsims, they will break through enemy defences in a blitz and escape encirclements.

Or maybe that's just me, wishful thinking.

His thread actually was completely innocent. It's not every day the mods resurrect a guy like he's Jesus.

That just reminds me: New players who are here for all of like two days and then make a thread in technical where they say that NS should add:

- A war feature
- The ability to undo issue choices
- Manually adjustable tax rates
- Manually adjustable stats
- International trade
- Basically anything else you can think of that would turn this game into a micromanagement game
