The Statement on Oswald

"Huh, nice to meet you again, Oswald. Still on your sickbed, we guess? We hope that you have a quick recovery, then. At this point we have talked quite a lot on what he is like in his normal version, then let's take a look of him in the Zombies Timeline. That name rings a bell of Black Ops Zombies series for our younger members."

"It seems that he at least tried to prepare some defense, but we can imagine the shock when it turned out that a horde wasn't just a metaphor, but rather a literal horde of flesh eating, undead zombies, capable of killing off cities in just a few hours. At least his servants warned him about the impending disaster, and soldiers set up a fortress around the palace, at least preserving the head alive. Imagine so much effort in protecting a few while the masses were dying! But it seems that others were doomed to begin with. That said, while he is armed well, for how long he will be able to keep shooting from the roof? If it is anything like the franchise, those waves of zombies will be limitless, and at one point he will need to give in. Sure, in real life all things are finite, but still..."

The Statement on Cristophe

"So, here he is - the conqueror, the man who made the Phoenicians to return back at Carthage... There are many ways of how to describe him. Either way, the tales of your aggression have been told from one side of the multiverse to another at this point. We could have helped Tunisians, sure, but religion is too weak of a link to aid them. Besides that, we are very different culturally, and have no business with them. And even if we aided them, Uzbeks could use that to blackmail us. Anyways, now to sum up what he is about."

"It is funny that he was awarded the title of "Lord of Tunis" by Tunisian government in 2015, with them probably not knowing that the same man would invade them 5 years later... One of his children is prince of Corsica? It seems that the dynastic politics are just as complex as ever, khe khe. Honestly, the contrast between the picture from his youth to the man he is today is staggering. At least he isn't purely ceremonial, and will have something to leave in the legacy for future generations, including paying the taxes and liberalizing the stance on LGBT+."

"What is this? There is no one person in charge? It is a political system that does the managing? That must be tedious. Who brings issues before it? Who performs the legislating? I do not know of any government that works this way. Even the Council of Nations is made up of people, and I can judge these people based on their morals. But here there is no one to condemn, no one to judge. There is only the Monolith, and I have no way of judging it. How does one fight a system? How does one tear down an assemblage that does not declare who is in power? It seems a remarkably good way to ensure that one's chosen allies remain in power forever, and a remarkably dishonorable one. I imagine this government would work better if their representatives brawled for the right of issuing policy. It would certainly be more entertaining to watch."

I dont see how the two of us cannot get along. The Statement on Alastair

"We have read the news snippets from your nation about your health condition and interviews with Keher, and honestly, some of our members even shed a bit of tear after reading through the chronology. However, we can't have time for that - our hearts must remain stone cold when representing the Directorate as a monolith."

"As we can clearly see from this man's speech pattern, he is in pain right now. The pain brought by cirrhosis, sepsis, and other nasty problems, which themselves were brought by his lifestyle. We think that in the end, Alastair's story actually has a bit of a moral behind it, and that he is a personification of destructive individualism - chosen the wrong choices without anyone pointing a gun to his head. Nobody forced you to drink after your father's death, it was your own choice to cope. This is the reason why Karakalpakstan doesn't have an individual as a head of state, because such national embarrassments like him can be disowned. But most importantly, listen to the thesis of our founder and hero Baltabay, you slob: "A truly collectivist society doesn't need an individual to lord over."

"They are socially conservative nationalists. They know how to deal with internal and external diplomacy, but they are just too liberal. I like their populist and patriotic style of governance, but they are just too lenient and still socialist in our eyes. Social democracy is just a code word for socialist degeneracy. Start giving the entire industry to the private sector and see how much wonders you'll get. This revolutionary council does not do enough to maintain tradition and order, for they are far too lenient to be consider civilized. Progressive policies will bring nothing to society, it will only bring a generation of spoiled pinko brats. Also, they are too broad and extensive, and not consolidated into one are a few people. In order for society to be truly secure, it must be consolidated in the hands of one or a few men through terror and fear. Don't let any ideas such as democracy or ethics make induce benevolence, terrorize the populace! Maim, torture and execute everyone who disagrees with the status quo! If the people are not afraid of their rulers, then their country are no more stable than an anarchy."

AN: "Wow, I never thought I would meet someone I could agree so much with. He maintains traditional values and opposes revolutionary ones! And he's anti socialist, which is always a sign of mental sanity. Though he could be a little more authoritarian, like me. Democracy and personal freedom is a sham used by the left to try to destroy tradition. This monarch must make sure that traditional values don't get thrown down the drain. If I were him, I would order a few political terrors and slaughter every single progressive commie scum. Otherwise, he's not bad. Could be more strict, but certainly better than all the degenerates the EU has to offer."

"This bastard can go sodomize himself with a rusty spear. I do not care about his politics, his mode of ruler-ship, or anything of the sort. He is not a leader. He abuses his people. His people, who trust him to lead them well, who trust him to protect them against outsiders. And more often than not, it is he who they need protection from. He does not deserve a single medal on his breast."

What he deserves is death- a long, painful one at that- and I will happily be the one to give it to him."

-Ari's amgery again, that seems to be happening quite a lot these days. Maybe she should take up yoga?
