I was only including the mainland territories of Colombia (and, admittedly, probably greatly underestimated what the population of that territory would actually be) when I wrote that. I later decided that the Colonies should largely be treated as integrated territories of the union while writing the Provinces factbook, but never bothered to update that section. Thanks for reminding me.

They've been a parliamentary constitutional monarchy since 1945, which makes me wonder how Antarctica could've been a formalised, habitable nation at the time.

Their nation is within, in essence, a massive permutation from our own setting. The presence of post-modern technology and legitimate Lovecraftian influences make a nationalist and socialist hyperpower sound not so ridiculous to conceptualize in such a world.

The government is technically an elective monarchy, with the Sovereign being chosen by the country's nobility, though in fact, the throne has been under the control of the Alfbadian family since 896.
