I suppose it may break some laws of physics. But hey, it's in a previously unknown part of the galaxy, blame it on like weird warps or something.

Oh sorry, Marsoslavia. I have learned that they are Slavs on Mars, and that is where the name comes from. I think they only have one language, but that isn't 100% sure. Finally, imagine squat dancing with super low gravity.

It's an army of 1,000 total. 500 infantry and 500 cavalry, not 250.

A result of it having been a plantation colony for centuries, the Guyanese economy relies heavily on agriculture: primarily the farming of rice and sugar, to a lesser degree the mining of bauxite and gold.

In their universe, Russia is still ruled by the Romanov dynasty, Britain still rules the waves (sort of) as a quasi-Imperial Federation, the United States only have 36 states and its "Vice President" is actually their "prime minister", Japan is still a regional power in the Orient, and Germany is of course still a glorious Kaiserreich. - Hatsunia is "Japan but better" as in they do not fall into mistakes that the Japanese have made, from big historical blunders to trivial ones in daily life.
- And from this, they also allow women to represent themselves better (which is a topic people tend to forget about Japan).
- They are also absurdly hi-tech. As expected, automation basically just crashes employment in there.
- Of course, their anthem is sung by Miku.
- Question: Has the player behind this nation used the software itself? Kind of curious.

The government of Zitragrad very keenly keeps tabs on its own populace through electronic means, like ID cards with chips are issued to all (adult) citizens, and also makes use of a secret police force. Albeit the bulk of HUMINT surveillance actually occurs in public spaces and within government buildings accessible to the general population.

In addition to approximately 100 other ships accounted for in the public version of the Palmeran Blue Wind Plan, Las Palmeras built the MR Tohorin, named after the Old Empire's patron sun goddess, which went on to sink at least three enemy ships during the war.

The Guyanese Commune has had a truly abysmal record on political freedoms and personal rights since its inception. However, it has a higher standard of living than most of its neighbors, due to British financial investments, government infrastructure programs, and a national health care system modeled after Britain's NHS.

Antarctica's ice thawed to the point that the southern continent became inhabitable throughout the 21st to 24th Centuries. As such, Antarctica became a climate refuge for those who wanted to get away from flooded areas. This has lead to the establishment of a highly cosmopolitan country.

From 1976 to 1994, the government was a guided (authoritarian) democracy that tried to prevent radicalism from both the left and the right after the fall of the Robotnik regime, but transitioned into an actual multi-party democracy after a non-violent coup.
