"A man, traumatised as a young boy, given the keys to the kingdom through less than ethical means. Hmm, I can see that he follows the trend so many of our own Empire's leaders do. When it comes to the measure of the man, I think what Zero always said was: 'could you trust them to lead you?' The answer is a resounding no. Regardless, if it were still PARADISE's early days I would have brought him to Doctor Raden - cuffed or not. His concerns are for good reason, sometimes toiling endlessly over something can have an extremely negative effect, something that I have experienced first hand myself. thankfully I had friends pull me out of such a situation. I hope that Tolya can do the same for her at some point in time, sooner rather than later... Aside from all that, it is good that he has a much more peaceful role with his new-found place. Because inequality exists among the weak. Those who are less weak will suddenly become the strongest in the group. The final purpose of invalidism is to remove all oppression, unfortunately, the methods you've chosen count as oppression, let's say the ends do justify the means, how do you face oppression from external forces? like nature? We sort of need to be strong against nature to at least adapt to it. Overall I'm still for making the weak strong simply because I don't know if this will work, sounds like a messy process that will cause unnecessary conflict. As for your actions, I can't say much since you didn't mention the details on how you deal with strong people."

"Just a... rather vocal opposition of things that are stronger and better than her. She is afraid of power yet struggles to obtain it... not realizing that once she ceases to be 'weak', she will just become one of the 'strong' she despises. And even if the weak are capable of ruling the world eventually, they will fall apart -- because true weakness of sentient minds are not in physical strength or mental capabilities. It is in selfishness, in survival instinct, in ambitions. Imbalance is just what happens when some people strive to be in a higher place and the rest fall behind. But don't worry, I am here to fulfill every single of your words, weakling. True, you might one day inherit the world. But on that day, I will look down from an even higher place. Chairman Estima is decisive and stern in his governance, but at times it appears that his entire politics revolves around defying everything remotely resembling "oppression", and some other actions are just calling for reaction. He is neither a fool nor a coward. But eccentric? He might be. True, he does not show that he is authoritative, and he appears willing to listen to the public. But I have not seen how he deals with his opposition."

"I am waiting until the taste of power becomes either too sweet or too bitter for him to continue taking it in. But for now? He is the best Sherechia could have for domestic leadership, but his diplomatic stance leaves much to be desired. However, his straightforwardness surprises me. It is on the verge of naivety from one angle, and sincerity from another -- rare from a politician."

As for Ilia herself, she seems to be the type to be prepared for anything, gathering as much information on everyone she is made aware of. To be honest, she is someone that even i could learn from. I have trusted plenty in the past out of kindness and there is no worse feeling than being betrayed by those you have deep feelings for. i have never felt true physical pain, but mental and emotional pain, i feel it just as much as any other mortal being. I suppose the lack of humour is to be expected in her position, her no-nonsense personality and approach to everything is also admirable... i also love the way she relaxes, what is not to love about listening to the wind and rain, especially at night time? candles and hugs too, also nice little things that i can definitely get by. Her four main policies are also spot on. I could not agree with them any more than i already do... Overall, I find Ilia a very respectable individual. If the chance was ever presented, I would most certainly love to meet her and get to know each other more, maybe even learn a thing or two. I may be an entity of the void, but that does not mean I am all-seeing and all-knowing. There is a lot that I could learn from many others out there."

“No, being half-robot does not make you ‘cringe’. What makes you ‘cringe’ (and certainly gets a cringe from me) is how badly your suit clashes with that hat! Does that thing have sentimental value, or some other reason that you keep it around? While I’m not averse to a fedora, one can’t just piecemeal things! Ugh!

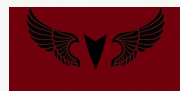

“That said, I was prepared to give the supercilious behavior the benefit of the doubt, so that I could offer some form of impartial view on what your stances are... and apparently being an overly-defensive edgemonster is literally all that you are. No, wearing that stuff doesn’t make you edgy. Being edgy makes you edgy, and as one who has been labeled such myself...”
-Kal’Shazzar, while pointing very pointedly at Enzo

Yes. It has very sentimental value. It’s the only thing close to being family for him.

"A cosmic entity? We've had to deal with a fair few of those before. Although, none of them have ever supported free healthcare, so maybe we've just been getting the bad ones. She sounds almost like the Emperor - I say almost because apparently she's an emotionally sensitive pacifist. I'd like the omniverse to send us more of these types of void entities, then we could actually talk to them. If she ever shows up in the Empire she can have Zero visit her, I don't trust dragons that can absorb black holes and maybe Zero can convince her to not use them - not on us, at least." - Edwin "Enceladus" Smith
