The Ghesites have domesticated horses to use as mounts - interestingly, not used also for work as beasts of burden. Rather than focusing on breeding a specific breed, they focus instead on individual utility and abilities of horses, breeding them across breeds to maximise speed, agility, and stamina. Culturally, the Ghesites possess strong companionship towards their mounts, a relationship somewhere between a pet and a companion (but not a family/clan member). There is also a stigma around eating horse meat, partly due to this companionship, and partly due to practicality surrounding the utility of horse mounts.

The Islands maintain a mainland colony, which operates semi-autonomously from the Islands though remain on a tight leash held by the United Yeglan Party. It's mostly allowed to play around with its own domestic policies, though the interests of the Islands in terms of a buffer state and military prowess always come first. The protectorate is one of three national states friendly towards the Islands.

Their capital city of Chemograd is surprisingly not dense. It has a population of 325,550,000, but has a land area of 78,796 square kilometers, meaning its density is only 4000 people per square kilometer, which is comparable to Philidelphia. This is dense, but not a can of sardines either. Though it is less of a city and more of a collection of sizable districts which could possibly be considered more akin to cities by themselves, and around 29% of the city is rural.

Well, I'll just say the brief summary of Liagolas is incredibly interesting, and I really like the idea. That being said, I learned that Liagolas is a failing attempt at a hivemind society, which is suffering from the results of opening up to the international world and humans being human.

The "United Imperium" was designed out of a political union of Sweden and Great Britain in the 1700s as a buffer against 'the threat of several other foreign powers'. I'd like to say by that point (after Sweden loses the Great Northern War) there is no way this would be an equal partnership.

I learned that Jamesian copy-pasted that line directly from Harmonic's factbooks despite this thread being explicitly about writing your own take on what you've read instead of being the same thing as the favorite line thread. Seriously, dude, you could've at least deleted the extra comma you copied.

Eros seems like a complete cinnamon roll, Theoria and the Varengish seem pretty bad, and actually all three of the main 'writers' seem like pretty cool and interesting characters in themselves, so it'll probably be really interesting to read their takes on the various lands, peoples, and places around the Harmonic Empire.
