Depends on the scope, and the perpetrator. If it's a small business owner who did it once, a fine and some community service is enough. If it's a high-powered executive doing this for years to protect his large private bank, life imprisonment.

This would probably lead into a very long and insane court fight, but I'd say that the person guilty might spend up to 5 years in prison, but with parole. They might be drafted into the government's scientific program, though, since forcing cybernetics into someone is actually impressive.

As for the victim, they'll be asked if they want to keep their cyber-stuff. If yes, well, they'll stay that way. If no, well, I guess we'll try our best to remove that.

Probably a fine in excess of $100,000 plus restitution if your insurance doesn't pay out. Also community service or jail time (1 - 2 years) depending on the severity of the injuries if there were any.

Death by hanging.

Wage theft.

An alternate China where Mao and the Communists never came to power and Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek stayed in office until his death in 1979 (RL death was in 1975.) The present regime is naturally much less democratic and more militaristic than that of RL Taiwan.

Today's conspiracy theories are tomorrow's facts, because the news is paid to distract and deceive us.
