Well, it can't be close to the successor of Rome because it is the successor of Rome and something can't be close to itself. It doesn't even have anything to do with right of conquest, really, just that Turkey has the best claim. Certainly a better claim than Russia did.

If you claim Russia as the Third Rome you can't claim the Soviet Union as succeeding to that position. The two are incompatible. The Ottoman Empire was the continuation of the Byzantine Empire under a new dynasty - new dynasties coming to power by force is hardly unheard of in Roman history - and its successor was Turkey, the Roman Republic.

You fools, every true scholar knows that the actual successor to Rome is Finland. After all, Finland was the only part of the Russian Empire (the Third Rome) that didn't fall to communism, and so it magically retains the status of heir to the Imperium Romanum. And of course, Finland has been a grand empire since time immemorial. Do you people even remember the Finno-Korean Hyperwar, sm my fuckin' h.

Don't cite me the Finno-Korean Hyperwar. I was there when it was fought.

The Glorious Finnish Empire would never agree to devolve and degrade itself by being granted the status of "Roman Successor."

Though I actually wondered as to why I didn't do the opposite. It's not so much because of Hyperinflation, but you would think me - the guy who loves large numbers - would throw in a "5 Trillion Valentian Credit" note.
