Their population is 70% kitsune, which presents an interesting dynamic as the kitsune is also their national animal.

That's like saying Israel's national animal is the Jew. There are SIGNIFICANT negative connotations. You might wanna rethink that idea.

Like the Norsemen of this universe, the Caleshan made their way to the Americas much earlier than the Romans ever did, but unlike this universe they were FAR more organized in their approach.

So the fact that Burma is under the Soviet Republic named BSSR. (That's a very nice and high-res map too, I dig it!) I wonder if that BSSR use the socialist flag that we used to have IRL, or was it something different.

So, the Kingdom of East Wolven's history spans back millennia, the land which it rests on was inhabited since FA 400, and one of the earliest examples of iron tools was discovered in FA 320, and the Wolven tribe that lived in Elgbekk decided to go pack up their bags and move south, picking up new friends along the way, hell, they even grabbed a few outcasts and made them full members of the tribe. And under Aðelberd, the tribe went from 1,200 to 11,000 and kept a strict discipline. Oh, and he introduced a lot of cool stuff to the tribe, such as arts and literacy.

The state's national religion is Maleficism, which recognises 13 emanations of their god and goddess.

Among these are the Faith (representing truthfulness and rationality), the Scar (representing mortal wounds) and the Well (representing space and the oceans)

They have a glorified caste system, in which citizens are sorted into 1 of 8 classes. Depending on their class, a citizen may be subject to different limitations to their civil rights and protections. However, it seems that they haven't figured out how exactly to limit these rights yet.

so apparently these boys' typical arcologies appear to be, well, domes stacked on top of domes, with each dome narrower than the one beneath it and supporting those around it. that's a pretty smart design tbh, though i do imagine that the ground weight starts to get, uh, extreme after a while, especially given the fact that good portions of the moon's outer crust are probably more holey than a slice of swiss cheese from the nineteenth century. oh, and their, uh, transport do-it-alls are "VTOL electric hypersonic spaceship/plane/helicopter/airship hybrids" which i can only imagine are rotary rockets with balloons strapped to the side.

Also, I find it quite interesting they have chlorocruorin in their blood. I have no knowledge in how biology works, but Chlorocruorin is typically found in tube worms - not bunnies. So unless chlorocruorin refers to something else, I find that to be quite an interesting choice, though you did make it clear that's because the planet was on fire for the longest time - leading to higher-than-normal CO2 levels.

In a rather fitting scenario, the leader of the whole station spent nearly his entire childhood trying to be something else: Something great if you will. His mother refused to send him to a regular school and instead gave him an irregular scientific education - while his father expected him to do more than Albert could likely do within his own lifespan. Then the riots happened, his ass was on the line, and he had to fly away. After that, he became a high-stakes criminal transporting Contraband like some kinda Han Solo without the furry before eventually running away because he murdered the Captain. Hence becoming the practical warlord of Miranda-22.

Basically, a period of intense geothermal and tectonic activity led to several hundred massive coal fields spontaneously combusting in Atis' early history, leading to a period where creatures without carbon monoxide resistance would simply die, or at the very least have a hard time living near any of these hotspots. Because of this, hemerythrin became the main oxygen transport due to carbon monoxide immunity, while chlorocruorin came later to supplement the oxygen the creature lost in the process.

This has been an unwanted biology fun fact by UCBR.

So in their version of Earth, the US functionally imploded and broke into five separate nations, all vying for control over the former extents of the USA. If I'm reading this right, California got turned into a variant of North Korea, and The Northwestern States turned into another communist republic, Dixie's back, and 'The North' is now basically New York through Quebec...
