Stabbing someone's skull with a tiara. Anne the suspect is a woman who threw her tiara in a fit of anger. Belle the victim was injured by the tiara piercing her forehead, entering past the skull into her brain. This injury was compounded by Anne trying to remove the tiara, therefore sweeping the metal arc around Belle's brain and effecting a lobotomy to the victim. Belle is now in hospital recovering from the injuries; the physicians assigned to her case indicate major damage to her higher mental faculties.

The AN did not set a crime for me...

Responding to AAN... Why would anyone make a plushie out of an insect? Unless it was cartoonized and turned into something silly and cute rather than something scary and demonic... But IF someone did, nothing would happen, nothingburger.

It's just another product to be sold like any other plush, no matter how bizarre.

Cannibalism. The person "only" ate the human flesh, was not responsible for the victim's death or amputation, or however that went down. She/He was not even responsible for the use or preparation of human flesh in the kitchen, the person in question just ate it.

Stealing the leader's office supplies every day for a year.

Stealing? From our leader? The Caput Omnium Familiae? Even once?

If you're able to steal from the boss, it means you know where the boss works. Which means, you know too much. This, of course, is punishable by us sending our top enforcers to kidnap you, haul you off to somewhere nobody will find you, and then kill you. And nobody will ever find your body.

That is how seriously we take the security of our boss. Knowing the identity of the boss, let alone the location of the boss, is strictly for those who have earned that trust. Those who would leak this information threaten the integrity of our criminal empire, and are dealt with seriously.

Hard labor under the freight train company. How long the criminal works is up to the company, but the minimum is equivalent to however long the offender spent train hopping.
