POV: you're a regionally sized PMT/MT nation and the nation that replies below you in a "would YN beat AN thread" and they span the entire multiverse with a bazillion gamma ray weapons all linked together in a hivemind consciousness and just reply with a singular "yes"

breaking bad funny

not that i focus much on military for any of my nations anyhow, i gloss over such things heavily. i think i had a page once in federal remnants that was fission powered armor but i deleted it because that wasn't really the focus of the nation, even then that nation would be quickly curbstonped by the first space empire that walks around the corner

Guilty...although this nation doesn't span an entire multiverse and isn't linked in a hivemind consciousness...

I can agree with the not reading factbooks part. Ōmiya has been compared to both former PM Abe and Stalin for reasons I can't understand.

I've said it earlier here on my alt, but when people decide to create an evil nation, then they want to make it as evil as they possibly can. Why have a boring old tinpot dictatorship lead by the military, when you can have a fun hyper-totalitarian slave-state.

Puppet regions seem to be really common now. Perhaps they've become a cliché. I, for one, have taken a couple of preexisting puppet storage regions and flooded them with my own puppets.

Meanwhile all three of my hellscape nations are boring. I happen to like my dystopias vaguely horrible. I suppose I'm odd like that.

But you know what really grinds my gears? It's how my boi "scale" was slaughtered. Ya'll really think your billions upon billions of soldiers or so forth are actually impressive considering some of your nations rule over Galaxies and Universes and what not?

Ya'll really think Warhammer even conceivably approaches the numbers that one can pull out?

In reality, the scale of an organization that can pull even on a percentage of a Galaxies wealth would trounce over any understanding of the scale of space. Ya'll just wanna be picking on the little guys instead of thinking of how many bullets you can make go fast."

I'd actually like to point out the opposite.

Space is fucking huge and yet people seem to think that that doesn't throw the concept of a supply chain into a blender, pull out the remains, incinerate them, and expose their ashes to FOOF for good measure. While a number of settings find ways to get around this (my boi pointy green stick man, for one) or simply do the above to the concepts of borders, travel time, and sanity in general, like Synne and Biggie G, it's especially irking to see those billions upon billions of soldiers deployed without any thought for how they're fed during their trips between planets packed into tin cans like sardines. And then there's the issue of managing your deployment environment and ensuring a scenario where you can actually keep track of the battlefield and scaling your troop distributions to cope with dozens of theater-sized forces being batted around the same front and it quickly becomes a clusterfuck of managing moving parts that seems to me incredibly unrealistic to consider, especially since- like you said- the perpetrators of this particular trope generally just want to trample the little guy.

To be fair, you could still have galaxy-scale or even smaller civilisations trading with extragalactic entities and sending cargo outside the bounds of their home galaxy. Intergalactic trade doesn't have to occur between intergalactic polities.

Also, on that note, there is actually a nation dedicated entirely to intergalactic commercial transport - Pan-Galactic. Pretty cool guy if I do say so myself.
