I'd recommend carbon-eating nanobots but that adds a touch of kink 'cuz of the vore.

As somebody who draws, I feel a little stuck between a rock and a hard place when making the typical leaders for use in F7 or potential RPs in the future. Too attractive and I feel people will get distracted by the sexy. It's a common joke around fellow posters, more than three people have mentioned Montse's old design, as an example. Which is why I trimmed down the curves, in part, though I actually began to establish the Home Island Palmerans/Tohorinese as slim people. Too unnoticeable or plain-jane and I feel I don't get the sweet sweet upvotes.

I suppose it says a lot about conventional beauty standards, reflecting on this I've seen tons of leaders with military experiences; I think it's easier to mention leaders that aren't vets. And they're all veterans who look impeccable despite being in combat service instead of pencil pushers or logistical support. One or two should be bound to have injuries but that doesn't seem to be the case. I wonder if the stigma around physical disfigurement is too much to get across...or if it's so touchy a subject, many prefer to not mention it. Eyepatches don't count.

The closest I've read has been KG's Ari, who shows that messing around with knives have consequences on those not Princess-like hands.

the ns cliches thread operates something like a black hole. once you've passed the event horizon, you're stuck here with the rest of us talking about chastity bots. welcome back!

A better way to explain NS-cliches is that you start into an orbit of the blackhole. Then someone posts something, most likely about a cliché, then other people start responding. With every response, you go deeper into the blackhole of chastity-robots. After someone hasn't posted in a while, the thread resets and is back in orbit.

..okay, that... that was bad.

As somebody who draws, I feel a little stuck between a rock and a hard place when making the typical leaders for use in F7 or potential RPs in the future. Too attractive and I feel people will get distracted by the sexy. It's a common joke around fellow posters, more than three people have mentioned Montse's old design, as an example. Which is why I trimmed down the curves, in part, though I actually began to establish the Home Island Palmerans/Tohorinese as slim people. Too unnoticeable or plain-jane and I feel I don't get the sweet sweet upvotes.

The whole "distracted by the sexy" thing is definitely a problem, but for me it's less in the "readers are homi" and more the "author was homi" sense, if I don't know the author well. If I see a character with too much focus on their appearance I'm gonna have a bit more of a roadblock into getting into the character because I'll be looking at it all a bit more hesitantly. Of course, most times I end up pleasantly surprised with a non-homi character, but there are always a few instances.

I suppose it says a lot about conventional beauty standards, reflecting on this I've seen tons of leaders with military experiences; I think it's easier to mention leaders that aren't vets. Yeah, she's got some seriously fucked-up hands by this point. And a fucked-up cheek, and a fucked-up side, and a fucked-up shoulder, and... yknow, at this rate she'd probably set off domestic abuse alarms if it wasn't for the fact that the other guys look much, much worse.

I'm just gonna come out and say that while I do have horny in my worldbuilding, it's mostly either as a joke or to signal that 'okay, this character is...yeah' or among those lines, though I'm only proud of it if it's meant as a joke, I do not really feel proud using it for characterbuilding because...ergh, it makes me feel second-hand shame.
